Even as You and I, U.N. Has Trimmed Its Housing Plan to Fit Its Pocketbook

By RALPH PETT

New York (U.P.)—The U.N. in every hustler's eyes a band of muck-rakers anxious to get the headlines at the site of its headquarters.

The United Nations has had to base its housing for the past two years of its existence on the basis of the architecture of the new building.

Don't get the wrong idea: The U.N. did not find the show place of its operations. It is not the U.N. but the U.N.'s permanent home that is at stake.

Among other changes, the U.N. has had to eliminate a room for the architectural study. This room was eliminated last year, but the U.N. had to eliminate seven of the rooms at the end of last year.

The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The U.N. has had to eliminate seven of the rooms at the end of last year.

The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The U.N. has had to eliminate seven of the rooms at the end of last year.

The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The U.N. has had to eliminate seven of the rooms at the end of last year.

The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The U.N. has had to eliminate seven of the rooms at the end of last year.

The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The new building, as planned, was to have been a large building with a large roof. The U.N. has had to eliminate seven of the rooms at the end of last year.