2 States May Lease, Modernize

NHRR NYC-New Haven Section

A New York governor recently urged the two states to lease the New Haven Railroad, and another governor has thrown his weight behind the idea. The result could be a sweeping $80 million modernization program for the New Haven, which operates 100 air-conditioned cars. The governor of New York, who has backed the idea, is to visit New Haven next week and is expected to announce that he will endorse the proposal. The governor of Connecticut, who has also been mentioned as a possible backer, is expected to make a decision within the next few days. The project, which would require state action, would also have to be approved by the New Haven and the Connecticut Railroad Commission.

The project, which would include the modernization of the entire New Haven line, has been championed by both governors. The New Haven Railroad has been in operation for more than a century and is one of the oldest railroads in the country. The two states have been discussing the idea for several years, and both governors have been pushing for action.

The proposal would involve the modernization of the New Haven's west end, which runs from New York to New Haven. The west end is the busiest part of the line and is heavily used by commuters. The modernization would include the addition of air conditioning, which would make the ride more comfortable for passengers.

The New Haven Railroad has about 100 air-conditioned cars, and the governor of New York has said that he would like to see the line modernized. The governor of Connecticut has also been a strong advocate of the proposal.

The project would involve the construction of new tracks, the replacement of old bridges, and the modernization of the New Haven's rolling stock. The governor of New York has said that he would like to see the project completed within five years.
