Order Radar For Airlines

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Federal Aviation Agency on Monday ordered a new system of radar equipment for airport control towers, and 110,000 other aircraft by Jan. 1.

It ordered that Douglas Aircraft Company will develop a system for visual contact with aircraft, and that the equipment will be flown to各地 by next Jan. 1.

The FAA and many air carriers supported the order and said it would lead to greater safety for air traffic.

Ward B. Mann, chief of the FAA's flight service station, said that the new radar would be the first step in reducing the major hazard of air traffic.

The FAA is now working with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration on a system for weather radar.
