Beep Beeps Up
Slum Fight

Though Governor Carey recently signed a law to aid slum fighting, there are some things the law does not cover. The law is not all-encompassing, and it is up to the cities to decide what will be done. The law only sets a minimum standard, and the cities are free to do more if they wish. However, the law does provide some funds to help cities in their efforts to fight slums.

On the other hand, the law does provide some guidelines for cities to follow. The law stipulates that cities must show evidence of progress before they can receive funds. The law also requires cities to keep a record of their progress, and to report this information to the state. This will help the state to see which cities are making progress, and which ones are not.

The law also sets some standards for the construction of new housing. Cities must provide a certain amount of new housing for each person who is displaced by the demolition of an old building. The law also requires cities to provide some assistance to the displaced persons, such as temporary housing, and counseling.

In addition, the law requires cities to provide some assistance to the new tenants of the new housing. The law requires cities to provide some assistance to the new tenants of the new housing, such as counseling, and job training.

In summary, the law is a good start, but it is not enough. Cities must do more to fight slums, and they must do it in a way that is fair to everyone. The law sets some guidelines, but it is up to the cities to decide what will be done. The law only sets a minimum standard, and the cities are free to do more if they wish.