The Shaker Road-Loudonville fire on South Main Street was one of the most unusual and interesting scenes to take place in the state in recent years. It was not unusual in the sense that it was not a fire, but rather a scene of total disregard for the life and property of others. It was unusual in the sense that it was not a fire, but rather a scene of total disregard for the life and property of others.

The scene began when a number of people, including the former Lydia DeMilio Labello; the former Jessie Malynoski; and a daughter, Miss Patricia Ann Veigh, were found dead in a house on South Main Street. The cause of death was determined to be carbon monoxide poisoning.

In addition to the victims, a number of other people were also found to be in the house, including a woman who was pregnant. However, she was able to escape and was taken to the hospital.

The cause of the fire was determined to be the result of a short circuit in the electrical system. The fire was reported to the Shaker Road fire department shortly after the fire was discovered.
