Editors' Note

"Give him a chance," the Amsterdam News editorial of April 4, 1965, stated. "Let the man speak."

The present ghastly nightmare of violence and counter-violence is one of the most tragic crises to occur on the pages of the Negro press in this country. In many ways, however, it is typical of the improvement of age; situations which have existed throughout the three centuries of our existence.

Now, the foundations of the second-class citizenship and fundamental status in which the Negro is enmeshed in the segregated society seem to have vanished. He, like so many of our number, was a victim of the criminal riot, the criminal explosion from the cauldron of oppression, poverty, and injustice which engulfed the masses of America.

In youth, there was no hope, no vision, no action, no organized mass action.

He was too young for the response, but too old for the innocence of violence.

The present ghastly nightmare of violence and counter-violence is one of the most tragic crises to occur on the pages of the Negro press in this country. In many ways, however, it is typical of the improvement of age; situations which have existed throughout the three centuries of our existence.

Now, the foundations of the second-class citizenship and fundamental status in which the Negro is enmeshed in the segregated society seem to have vanished. He, like so many of our number, was a victim of the criminal riot, the criminal explosion from the cauldron of oppression, poverty, and injustice which engulfed the masses of America.

In youth, there was no hope, no vision, no action, no organized mass action.

He was too young for the response, but too old for the innocence of violence.