This is the second and final series of an article, which appeared in the Albany Times Union last year on the reelection of Mayor Carey for a third term. Carey won narrowly, but he faces a challenging political climate.

Black in Governor Carey's administration

Margarette Saunders is in charge of personnel services and Emile Drysdale oversees personnel services for the New York State Department of Correctional Facilities.

Linda Randolph is assistant commissioner for New York City at the Health Department. Goldie Watkins is deputy commissioner for manpower management at Mental Retardation.

The Executive Chamber

The real center of power in the Carey administration is the Governor's Office, which is located on the Executive Chamber floor. It is here state development is coordinated, and this is where the governor's administrative assistants work.

Notably, the highest-ranking one is Mary Burke Nicholas who runs the Executive Chamber's Women's Division. Nicholas is a former HUD administrator and ex-wife to former Mayor Robert Wagner.

But the Women's Division has a staff of only seven and hardly plays a role in policy-making.

Morgan is secretary to the governor and is the single most powerful individual in the Carey administration. He, not Carey, keeps a constant finger on the pulse of state politics.

Del Giudice as director of policy management is also among the most powerful Carey administration appointees.

Between their two offices there are only three ' Blacks and perhaps two other minority candidates — and perhaps a few Hispanics and women are included in the inner circle of Carey's advisors.

The governor's Office of Employee Relations handles labor negotiations with the state's public employee unions. There are three Black professionals on its staff, none of whom are assistant or director of assistant level.

The appointments office serves as a combined personnel and patronage center, helping match qualified applicants — often with political credentials — to both paid and honorary appointments.

There is one Black assistant appointments officer, Philip Hilton.

The director of communications and the press secretary handle public relations for the governor. As a result of decentralization in the campaigns of the last two years, this role has become more important.

The Guardian Angels

The Guardian Angels, New York City's self-appointed vigilantes, have always been a controversial organization. The question is whether the Guardian Angels could be quickly incorporated into state law enforcement for the 1982 gubernatorial election, or if they would continue to function as a private force, independent of law enforcement.

The city's corporation counsel and criminal justice coordinator would have to approve any such changes.
