Symphony in tune
for park concert

By BERNARD BAUM

The New York Philharmonic, which recently announced its twelfth concert in Central Park Sunday, Aug. 25th, will conduct its symphony in tune for a park concert tomorrow, Thursday, at Westchester Country Club, Croton-on-Hudson.

The orchestra will present the opening concert of the New York Philharmonic's 110th season on Tuesday evening, when the New York Philharmonic plays its first season of concerts in the United States and brings to New York Central Park, to be attended by 40,000 people.

The orchestra is composed of the New York Philharmonic, to perform in three concerts, each in a different concert hall in the United States, and all under the direction of Zubin Mehta.

Zubin Mehta, who conducted the New York Philharmonic in its last ticketed concert in 1980, will conduct the last ticketed concert of the season on Aug. 5, at the Columbia Union, when the New York Philharmonic will perform its final concert of the season, at the Henry Moore Performing Arts Center, in Croton-on-Hudson.
