Skies in June

By JAMES STOKLEY
Enterprise Science Service

Of three planets in the June evening sky only Jupiter will be seen easily all month. Directly opposite the sun on June 24 it will rise in the Southeast at sunset and remain visible all night. On June 1 Venus, even brighter than Jupiter, will be prominent in the west at dusk, setting nearly two hours after sunset. It's drawing rapidly toward the sun, however. A week later it will set only an hour after the sun. It passes between sun and earth on June 17, becoming a "morning star," rising in the east just before sunrise.

Mars, the third evening planet, will not be easily visible this month. Approaching maximum distance from earth, it has faded to second magnitude so it's about as bright as the pole star. It sets, on June 1, about two and a half hours after sunset. The accompanying maps show the sky as it looks about 11 p.m., local daylight saving time, on June 1. It looks the same about 10 p.m. on the 15th.
