DAILY TIMES

JOHN B. GOUGH.

BY [illegible]

(Written for the TIMES.)

On the 22d of August in 1817, there was born in the village of Sandgate, Kent, on the other side of the Atlantic, another human being to add to the world's vast population. The careful eye of a mother watched over the sleeping babe and administered to its wants. As the mellow rays of the sun and the soft raindrops cause the violet of the valley to bud and blossom, so did this tiny thing, under the judicious treatment of parental care, grow day by day until he soon reached boyhood. Often did his father relate to him the story of the advantages which America offered to the young, and it so captivated the youth that at the early age of twelve, he set sail for America, and when he landed on our coast, he found himself in a new land, homeless, penniless, friendless, and a wanderer among strangers. After being subjected to many hardships and privations before obtaining employment, he at last found work as a farm hand in Oneida county.

Longing for a higher sphere of action, his stay was of short duration, and he accordingly left for New York, where he soon became engaged in the bindery department of the Methodist book establishment. Here he applied himself diligently to his tasks, and gradually won the esteem of his employers and the good will of his fellow-workmen. The clouds which so darkened his early struggles began to disperse, and the sunlight of hope [illegible]. The [illegible] for gaining a reputable livelihood had a pleasing aspect to the youth, and hope took in his bosom the place of despair. By his social disposition and pleasant [illegible] he won many admirers, and his circle of friends began to enlarge. Having then attained the age at which so many young men are [illegible] from those principles upon which is builded the foundation for a noble character, by the fanciful agencies which intemperance uses to allure the young, he likewise yielded to the temptation, and before he had reached his one-and-twentieth year, he became so addicted to the use of strong drink as to become an habitual drunkard. The strong confidence which his employers had placed in him began to weaken, and the prospects which looked so favorable at the outset for his prosperity, seemed to be put to an end forever.

While his friends lamented his downfall, his evil companions rejoiced that so remarkable a young man should become their companion. Thus he who had won so much homage, sympathy and affection, became the subject of shame, remorse and despair. Unlike those with whom he mingled, nature seemed to have given him the faculty of singing—a gift in which he was not [illegible]. It was through this medium he used to obtain means whereby to purchase liquor to appease the craving of his appetite, and after having sung a song, he would resort again to his debauchery. It was upon one of these occasions that he drew around him a group of listeners, among whom was an aged Quaker who was moved to his very soul by the rich and pathetic voice of the singer. The good old man thought that one so young who had the genius to hold a street-gang mute and entranced, must possess a warm and tender heart, and if he could but be persuaded to retrace his steps from the paths of dissipation into which he had strayed, he might with his talent prove to be a blessing to mankind. He therefore resolved to go and see him, and, if possible, induce him to give up the degrading life of a drunkard, before he had gone beyond the reach of human influence. The aged Quaker described to him the despicable life which eventually must be his, and by a plain and forcible exhortation at last succeeded in gaining his favor. He did not wholly adhere to the advice of his friend, however, and consequently easily fell a victim again.

Fortunately for the cause of temperance and humanity, a change took place about this period which altered the whole tenor of his life. The visits which he used so frequently to make at grog-shops as a rum-sot ceased, and intemperance lost its distinguished prey. "Heaven seemed to have adopted him as an instrument for the accomplishment of a great work," and his name became established at once as a leader in the temperance reform. His thrilling experience of a drunkard's life as narrated by himself reached the heart of the public, and the sneers of the rumsellers nerved him to greater action than the applause of his friends. Men were surprised that one who but a short time since was an outcast, a gluttonous drunkard and the butt of so much ridicule, should thus arise from obscurity, and hold congregated thousands speechless with his eloquence. His influence in this grand movement has been felt alike in the high and low circles of society, for wherever he found intemperance, it was there he would put forth his heart-stirring utterances to remove its evils.

Often the half-famished inmates of rude huts and shattered walls of lonely garrets have received at his hands both food and raiment, for a more generous heart does not beat in the bosom of man. Families whose homes were made the wretched habitations of vice, poverty and misery by the overpowering passion of intemperance, have become through the agency of this one man the happy abodes of piety, plenty and peace. To no one person of our time do the American people owe so much gratitude for the furtherance of the temperance cause as to him. For nearly a half a century he has stood before the people of this and transatlantic lands battling against the mighty tide of intemperance, and though now physically enfeebled by old age, he stands today without a peer. Long after he shall have gone to his last rest, his name will shine in the firmament of temperance.

Artificial Diamonds.

The latest exploit in diamond-making is that of Mr. H. S. Marsden, described in the proceedings of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. He heated charcoal of sugar mixed with silver during ten hours, then cooled them slowly, and dissolving out the silver with nitric acid, found carbon in three forms, graphite, brown sooty material—probably carbide of silver—and small octahedral crystals, hard enough to scratch glass, quartz and sapphire. The microscope displayed two varieties of these crystals, one dark colored, the other transparent. Mr. Marsden believes that by using sufficient quantity of material he will be able to produce diamonds large enough for rock-boring. If so jewelry may be expected to follow in due course, and diamond-factories working with tons of sugar and silver.

Mr. B. Bruce, of Cleveland, O., writes: "I [illegible] generally as well. Not desiring to get into the clutches of some rapacious doctor, I stepped into a drug store and inquired if they had a remedy that would cure anything and everything. The clerk promptly handed me a bottle of Brown's Iron Bitters. I said, 'Is it good for dyspepsia?' He replied, 'There is nothing better.' I said, 'My urine [illegible] I guess my kidneys are out of order.' 'Just the thing,' said he, 'for kidney [illegible] you will find it strengthens all parts of the body, and very refreshing to the mental faculties.' [illegible] I never before believed in [illegible], and now I make Brown's Iron Bitters the only exception, for I really believe it will relieve any disease that human flesh is heir to."
