An incident of 1888. An incident that took place way back in the presidential election of Harrison and Morton in 1888 on the evening of November 25th, when the Republicans of Martinsburg celebrated their national victory just when it had been previously announced that Robert Furber would perform his task in the office of the county clerk in the store in the old county clerk's office on D. L. Lovejoy's hotel and back, in the event of Harrison and Morton's election, as a part of the performance. This of course called out a crowd to see what the boys came out in man with their torchlight procession, all uniformed, with Collins' Martial band at the head. John, who tipped the beam at 200 pounds, placed himself squarely on the barrow, with a fine cheese box to sit upon, with the Stars and Stripes waving in the breeze on either side. Rob was modestly attired for the occasion with an elegant suit, with a white necktie and high silk and a square bandanna around his neck. When the signal for advance was given, Robert squared himself for his task. Well, he did it grandly and in fine style. Anybody acquainted with the circumstances would have thought that the Great Eastern had struck and was ploughing its way through our streets and that the waves and shores would submerge the whole town, but no bones were fractured. Rob, who is decidedly muscular, walked more erect than "Job Sweet" in his pinkest days, and wouldn't about for Harrison all the same.
