CIGARETTE SELLING SYSTEM.

How Each Customer is Automatically Supplied With Favorite Blend.

Writing of the application of system to large businesses, Atherton Brownell says in World's Work: Systems have been devised, by which, with the aid of a single clerk, a more minute and accurate record can be kept of a great business house than could be kept by a large force of accountants. A good example of a perfect system is the one used by a firm of cigarette makers who have a private trade, for they make their goods to order for individual customers. The characteristic feature of their business is that they mix the tobacco to suit each individual customer's taste. They must have direct communication with their patrons, and these patrons buy as few as 500 cigarettes at a time. To get their trade is easy; to hold it is more difficult. On their files, they carry a memorandum of the tastes of perhaps 2,000 smokers and the formula of the mixture which suits everyone best, together with a design of his crest or monogram, which he desires stamped in his wrappers. Every customer's daily consumption is noted and by the automatic operation of their system, his name comes to the front a week before he may be reasonably expected to have exhausted his last order. So nicely has this system been adjusted, that recently, during a spell of extremely humid weather, when orders could not be filled, every customer found his wants supplied, during this period of waiting, from a stock kept on hand for the purpose.

We All Eat Too Much.

As the result of his exhaustive experiments with a squad of United States soldiers doing heavy gymnasium work under restricted diet, Prof. Chittenden, of Yale, concludes that most people eat too much.

The men were worked hard in gymnasium and gained steadily and greatly in strength while they were being fed far less than the average diet.

They were called the "Starvation Squad," but their photographs taken at the close of the experiment do not look like those of starving men, rather like those of competent gymnasts. Says Prof. Chittenden in his recently published "Physiological Economy in Nutrition": "Our results . . . justify the conviction that the minimal protied requirements of the healthy man under ordinary conditions of life are far below the generally accepted dietary standards, and far below the amounts called for by the acquired tastes of the generality of mankind. The amount of protied or albuminous food needed daily for the actual physiological wants of the body is not more than one-half of the protied food ordinarily consumed by the average man. Body-weight (when once adjusted to the new level), health, strength, mental and physical vigor and endurance can be maintained with at least one-half of the protied food ordinarily consumed."

Protieds are the chemical elements that most people get by a meat diet, through beans, peas and some other vegetables are also strong in protieds. Eat less meat is the practical equivalent of Prof. Chittenden's advice.

It has been noticed by amateur mountaineers that Adirondack guides and Swiss mountain men eat less solid food than the average Wall street broker, who does little physical labor.

Learning French.

I recently visited the most famous international institute in Switzerland, writes "N. R. C." in the London Mail, and was enabled to witness the whole system by which splendid linguists are turned out.

As soon as the boy arrives he is told that he must speak French, and on every occasion he speaks his mother tongue he is given a certain number of "lines" to write out. These are usually in French and German.

Take French as an example. Say the pupil is English, and does not know a word of French. He is shown a huge illustrated map with all kinds of animals, trees and common objects in colors. The master will point to an animal, the boy is told the French for it, and in a very short time he knows the name of every object on the map. The whole time he is being spoken to in French and getting accustomed to the sound.

One little chap informed me that he was English. He spoke French and German with great fluency, and he had a fair smattering of Italian. "How long have you had this youngster?" I asked the head master. "Oh, he's only been with us a year and a half; but come and look at his written work."

This youngster's French and German were excellent and his Italian fair.

Coins a New Word.

An Ohio man wrote to Elmer Dover, secretary of the Republican national committee, claiming to have done great work for Roosevelt in the campaign, and asking for a job. He said he would like to be "chief cuspidorian" of the Treasury Department. Mr. Dover wrote in reply: "I regret to inform you that there is no such position as chief cuspidorian of the Treasury Department, although I think there might very well be. Unfortunately, however, while you have coined a word, I cannot coin the job."

Prof. Korn of Munich has presented a report to the Bavarian Academy of Sciences stating that he has perfected a system for transmitting photographs, sketches and facsimiles of signatures over ordinary telegraph wires. Any photograph, he says, can be transmitted over a wire 1,000 miles long in twenty minutes.
