OSWEGO MORNING POST.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1882.

The Splendors of Cairo.

As one takes a wider view of this beautiful town, and sees on all sides of one, stately palaces, some of them of the purest white marble, all of them covering acres upon acres of ground; as one passes into the costly furnished rooms occupied by some of our staff officers, and finds in single chambers vast chandeliers, huge mirrors, marble mantle-pieces, stately mahogany doors, and Turkey carpets, some of which must have cost 500 pounds apice or more for carpeting of the single room, all this being repeated through room after room, and suite of rooms after suite of rooms, while corridors, with such rooms on either side, run round grand marble-covered square after square; as one sees tropical flower garden, glassed over within the palaces, fountains playing in many parts of a palace, while the town is divided between the space taken up by the wretched tradesmen's shops, the portentious barracks, and these splendid palaces, one finds much food for reflection. Most of the magnificent buildings, which, with their gardens and grounds, occupy enormous spaces within the town, have been built within the last few years or little more. As you ask, "Whose palace is that?" you learn that this, was built for a son of Ismail Pasha when he came of age, that for a daughter at the same period of her life. Here and there, some other relative or minister of state has been provided for, but for the most part you receive the same answer. Of the numerous progeny of Ismail, each one was thus provided for as soon as he or she reached years of maturity. And for every palace suitable attendants were provided, with all sorts of high functionaries over them drawing splendid salaries from the state. Many, if not most, of the palaces are now simply closed, since Ismail and many of his sons disappeared from the scene. But the salaried officials still continue pretty much as they were. During the old times each year saw at least one palace rise which but a fortune into the pockets of some foreign contractor, another fortune into the pockets of the Jew who had provided the money at reckless interest, and supplied ever fresh, hosts of placeholders with new comfortable appointments.

The Gospel Relaxation.

One of the world's hard workers introduces himself as the apostle of relaxation. Mr. Herbert Spencer, after four score years of busy life, says to his American admirers, "We have had somewhat too much of "the gospel of work," it is time to preach "the gospel of relaxation.," There are men, plenty of them, who have been eloquently preaching 'the gospel of relaxation" all their lives and honestly practicing what they preached, but Herbert Spencer is not one of the lazy ten thousand, he speaks as a worker and after accomplishing the work he has, he may be allowed to know something of the "vanity" of work. While it is ture that his remarks were called forth by his observation of the fact the tendency to overwork is in the United States more marked than elsewhere, it will, we think, be readily conceded that the same tendency, if in a lesser degree, is becoming more and more apparent throughout the civilized world. The pitiable condition generally of the world's drones naturally provokes disgust, and it is not surprising that from this disgust should spring a corresponding reverence for work. Work has been gradually elevated from a curse to be a privilege and a virtue. We do not want to disparage work, it is an estimable thing in its place, and perhaps there are more people who love work too little, than there are who love it too much. But after all, the gospel of relaxation is not opposed to the gospel of work; what we want to preach to the slaves of work is the dignity of free labor, and that men may work without being the slaves of work. The motives which induce men to overwork themselves are very diverse, but few of them are anything like adequate. It is a poor investment for a man to devote himself body and soul for a lifetime to the acquisition of wealth in order simply that he may leave a fortune to some disciple of the gospel of relaxation. Men should work to live, not live to work and it is well to remember that there is a difference between relaxation and idleness. A change of employment may be the best form of relaxation and, in fact, to most busy men enforced idleness is the hardest of hard work. The question now is a social one rather than a political one, and all that governments have to do with it, is to see that individuals do not use any exceptional power they may possess to compel others to overwork themselves. Formerly, however, the institution for public amusements was one of the cares of a paternal government, and indeed was one of the pillars of the state, inasmuch as it tended to satisfy the subjects and divert their attention from political intrigues. It is not of much use, however, preaching against overwork; it is the effect of something else, and until the cause is modified the effect will remain. Wealth has always had an exaggerated value in the popular mind, and the mania for self-sacrifice on the altar of Mammon is increasing. The vanity of riches is such an old and well worn text that even Herbert Spencer would find it difficult to preach a very original sermon therefrom. The vanity of riches is one of those unfortunate truths which everybody admits to be true, but in which hardly any body's faith is of the active order.

Battling for Blubber.

Captin Willoughby states that on Saturday, October 21, the Neah Bay Indians discovered the body of an enormous whale floating near Waaeda Island, and a fleet of canoes put off in pursuit of blubber. On nearing the carcass they found surrounded by a great number of enormous bone sharks, from 25 to 30 feet long, who were gorging themselves with blubber, and were very savage. Captain Willoughby's son Oliver was in one of the canoes to see the fun. A shark came rushing at the canoe, and he turned to take a bite at it, one of the Indians, "Billy Balch," fired a pistol into its open mouth, killing it instantly. Another big shark rose under the canoe, which frightened Master Ollie so that he jumped on the whales back, from whence the Indians rescued him with his clothes saturated and ruined with the stinking gurry of the whale. The Indians succeeded in towing the carcass into Salt Rock River, a little creek two miles east of Neah Bay, where the head grounded in twenty feet of water, but a portion of the body and tail was exposed at low tide on the beach, and blubber taken off by the Indians, who are having a regular jollification over the feast of fat things.—Port Townsend W.T. Argus.

The Largest Locomotives in the World.

The Cooke Locomotive Works of Paterson, N. J., have several locomotives nearly completed for the Central Pacific Railroad. The engines have eight driving-wheels and four wheels placed under the truck. It is believed that these are the largest locomotives in the world. The weight of each is sixty-three tons, or ten tons more than the consolidated engines. They will be called the "Mastodon."

All Sorts.

Bishop Paddock, formerly rector of St. Peters church, Brooklyn, and now bishop of Washington territory, is seriously ill at his old home in Norwich, Conn.

Joseph Cook is uniquely described by the Gospel Banner as "the Boston gentleman who gave the plan upon which the universe was created, his unqualified person endorsement."

Despite Carlyle's repudiation of art, says Moncure D. Conway in The Record and Guide the one single purely artistic statute among the monuments of London is that of Thomas Carlyle.

Congressman Godlove S. Orth, of Indiana, who has been in very poor health for doubtful if he will be able to take his seat at the opening of congress.

Governor Blackburn, of Kentucky, is described as "a dashing-looking gentleman, with his broad-brimmed hat turned up on one side like a Spanish bull fighter, and his moustaches twirled out to a most prodigious length."

Judge Wylie stands the abuse that has been heaped upon him with great equanimity, and a broad and capacious smile is said to illuminate his countenance whenever he reads that he is a blockhead, dunce, scoundrel, etc., in the star route journals.
