FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1886.

There was great parliamentary generalship in the tactics by which Messrs. Gladstone and Parnell not only compassed the overthrow of Lord Salisbury but rendered him powerless for the mischief he intended to play, and undoubtedly would have played if his expectation of an issue on some phase of the Irish question, instead of upon an English agricultural question, had been realized. He confidently hoped to be sustained by the strength of national prejudice on the former, and in case of defeat he intended to dissolve parliament and go to the country upon it. The cost of a new election, which the aristocratic and wealthy tories could stand without sacrifice, would be very embarrassing to nearly all of Parnell's, and very many of Gladstone's followers, while the cry that the liberals and nationalists were intent upon dissolving the union and breaking up the empire, would arouse a feeling likely to carry men's heads away. But challenging the government upon Mr. Jesse Collings's proposition in the interest of more than 2,000,000 of the recently enfranchised voters not only enabled the opposition to defeat the government, but to defeat it in such a way that it would not dare to dissolve parliament and face the country on a question that in the late canvass took the slogan form of "three acres and a cow," and was very annoying and embarrassing to the land owners. The Tories by their defeat lost power and their hoped for opportunity to gain a majority in a new parliament on the Irish issue, and the vote by which they were defeated clearly indicates that the rich land owners among them will yet in some way be compelled to divide up their possessions and give the people standing room upon the land of their birth, to which they have a God given right.

The New York clinical society has had a discussion on "Hydrophobia and its prevention." Dr. William A. Hammond does not believe in Pasteur's methods. The Tribune gives the following abstract of his remarks: "The records show that the disease can only be communicated by the saliva, and does follow inoculation into the blood. He could only find one case in which this was said to have been successful, and the facts in this case are doubtful. The medical profession can only look on Pasteur with doubt. He goes contrary to all records. Out of the 100 cases inoculated by Pasteur only one has had hydrophobia. He explains this by saying that the case came too late. In the four cases from Newark which Pasteur treated there is no proof that the dog was mad that bit them. The same dog also bit four other dogs and two children, and they are all free from the symptoms of the disease. It will take many years of careful investigation of Pasteur's methods before any confidence can be placed in it. Hydrophobia is not a blood disease. It is an affection of the nervous system, and autopsies in cases, where the disease has existed without any doubt, as in the McCormick case, which occurred in 1874, show that the medulla oblongata and the upper part of the spinal cord are in a high state of inflammation and filled with extravasated blood. He did not believe that hydrophobia could be caused by inoculation any more than lockjaw. It could not be taken from the diseased brain of rabbits by Pasteur's methods, and must come from the saliva."

The cabinet meeting yesterday considered the policy to be adopted in regard to applications by the senate for information in regard to "suspension from office." The president is understood to be opposed to complying with requests for such information and is sustained in that view by all the members of the cabinet. Letters were formulated in answer to the requests of the senate for the papers touching the changes in the office of United States marshal for the southern district of Alabama, and in the office of collector of internal revenue for the district of South Carolina. The exact language of the letters cannot be learned, but it is known that they inform the senate that it is not deemed advisable to comply with the requests in their present form. It is understood that it is the desire of the administration to force the senate to state its position on this question so that the matter may be brought to an issue and settled as soon as possible.

The following dates for receptions at the white house for the remainder of the season are announced: Friday evening, January 29th, the president's reception to the public; Saturday afternoon, February 6th, Miss Cleveland's reception; Friday evening, February 12th, the president's reception to the diplomatic corps; Saturday afternoon, February 20th, Miss Cleveland's reception; Friday evening, February 26th, the president's reception to the army and navy; Saturday afternoon, March 6th, Miss Cleveland's reception. Tuesday evening, March 9th, the president's reception to the senate and house of representatives. The evening receptions are from 9 until 11, and the afternoon receptions from 3 to 5.

The New York Mail and Express speaks of Sir Henry P. Barnard as "a young English nobleman 'doing the states,'" and adds that he looks "more like a prosperous Western man than a peer of the realm of Great Britain." But Sir Henry is not a nobleman at all—at least not in the sense in which the word is here used—and he is very far from being "a peer of the realm," though he may be in all respects a much better man than the average peer. Sir Henry is one of the noble army of commoners, as class distinctions go in England. The Mail and Express, if it is going to please the Anglomaniacs, must read up on English social rules and usages.

There is a contest in Chicago over the two wills made by Wilbur F. Storey, late owner of the Times. One made in 1879 gives his wife nearly all of his property on condition that she does not marry again, in which latter event, a brother and sister of deceased inherit. The other will, made in 1881, gives the property to the wife without any conditions. It is this one which is contested by the brother and sister, on the ground that Storey was not a responsible person when the will was made. It seems to be a praiseworthy irresponsibility that makes a childless man give his wife all of his property without reserve.

MATTERS OF INTEREST.

"One of the ladies of the diplomatic corps is causing a great deal of talk by her immodesty in dressing," writes a Washington society correspondent, "and at a public gathering recently she appeared in a costume which, if it had been worn anywhere else, would have caused the interference of the police. She is young and beautiful, and her reputation is unstained, but even in Washington society, which tolerates almost everything, she cannot go much farther without losing the respect of decent people. She has always been noted for an ambition to exhibit the charms with which bountiful nature has endowed her, and the artistic perfection of her figure is as well known as the Washington monument, but her dresses have been cut shorter and shorter at the top, and wound more closely around her as the season has grown, until she might as well wear nothing at all. On the occasion referred to she appeared in a pink tinted silk which fitted her so perfectly that one who looked at her from across the room could not distinguish where the fabric ended and the flesh began. There wasn't a ruffle or a wrinkle from her corsage to her train, and not the slightest ornament, except a bunch of roses at her waist of the same tint as her neck and dress. The corsage was laced at the back, what there was of it, but from her chin to her waist it was one unbroken line, and as she faced you she looked exactly like a nude statue of a pink mermaid. Her skirts were as tight as her corsage, and every outline was as distinct as undraped nature itself. Of course she made a sensation, and I suppose that was what she wanted. She couldn't have caused more talk if she had appeared in flesh colored tights."

A New York correspondent tells of a momentous issue that has recently arisen:

A new theological question has arisen. Shall the Episcopalian clergyman, when he goes to the opera, wear the single-breasted frock coat of clerical cut or put on the regularly fashionable evening costume? This has religious countenance in these modern days, despite the wicked stories, ballets and characterizations. Rectors have refrained from witnessing dramatic performances, except on rare occasions; but they may in propriety—so the new usage says—go to the Metropolitan opera house or the academy of music as often as they please. Thus the problem of proper dress is up, and no official ruling has been made. The mind of a young minister was diverted from his professional coat the other night at the Metropolitan by the more cheeringly-clothed belle with whom he conversed between acts. "Do you believe in doing penance?" she asked. "Under some circumstances it is a beneficial discipline," he answered, resuming a pastoral gravity that had become somewhat relaxed. "Pray excuse me for turning this box into a sort of confessional," she murmured, "but the matter weighs on my conscience a little, and I do so want your advice. It rained yesterday, and I didn't attend the Sunday morning service." "I missed you from your pew," and he let a tone of sentiment get into his voice. "And here I am at the opera the very next night, though it is raining much harder." "That is palpable," and then he had to turn his eyes away from the fair vision in order to become the grave, soul-solicitous pastor. "Now, regarding you in your professional capacity," and she gazed up ravishingly into his face, "I think it right to tell you that I am doing penance for my fault. The gown I have on has been worn by me already at two balls and a formal dinner. Everybody in society knows it on sight. At home lies a brand new and awfully beautiful dress, finished expressly for this occasion. Besides this mental infliction I have caused bodily torture by drawing my stays in much tighter than usual over a strip of vaspingly coarse flannel. You comprehend the severity of my self-punishment. What do you think of it?" The young man expressed his views so incoherently that it would be useless to quote his language.

A Boston auctioneer's play of expression is singularly misleading, says the Beacon. An old lady from Roxbury dropped into an auction parlor on Bromfield street the other day just as the auctioneer was posing on a high stool, an old china vase in one hand, on which he threw the most endearing glances, evidently recalling tender reminiscences in a foreign tongue, or somethin' of that kind, as not one word of his discourse was understood by those present. Then he draped himself in a small rug and burst into a stream of brilliant rhetoric in the panick language; next he seized a brass tray over which he became so eloquent that those on the back seat were awakened as by an electric shock. Finally he capped the climax by holding aloft a small marble Clythie and shouting his first intelligible words: "Two, ten, who bids?" As the crowd dispersed the old lady remarked with tears in her eyes: "That's the most touching soloist I ever heard. I'm glad I came. I can always say now that I've been to a symphony concert with the best of 'em, and I ain't ashamed to say I cried, either. How he did act it out!"

Speaking of the indelicacy in dress of some women at the opera, the New York correspondent of the Boston Globe writes:

Upon careful examination and scientific computation it is pretty certain that of the women in the opera in any five boxes adjoining one another, not less than one out of every three is three-quarters naked above the waist—that is, of the square inches of surface from the waist up three-quarters are exposed to the view and to the air. While this is true of opera-goers, of those who go to balls it is far worse. The percentage of semi-nude figures increases until fully 95 per cent. is reached. What may be thought of the propriety of this stripping of the body from a standpoint of modesty is one thing, and from a standpoint of health and will admit that nothing can be more trying to the constitution of any young girl or middle-aged matron than exposure, and yet night after night hundreds take off flannels and high necked cloth dresses to put on the low-waisted low necked, sleeveless corsage. If they were to go to a place where there were no drafts no harm would be done, but as it is, in every place they go the rooms have not only different temperatures, but the doors are being constantly opened and closed, letting in currents of cold air which sweep over their naked shoulders. Does nothing come of it? Of course. So often, it is said, that Miss So and So has a bad cold, or that Mrs. This and That is laid up with pneumonia, that one hardly pays enough attention to the remark to remember it. These constant colds, the doctors say, predispose women to cold by creating a local weakness in the lungs. Nothing is so common as pulmonary complaints or bronchial affections, and in nine cases out ten the case is no more remote than the low-necked dress. The doctors may speak of this evil and implore their patients to wear clothes, but without avail. Beautiful women will take medicine, but at clothes they will insist upon drawing a line.

NOTE AND COMMENT.

The New York Sun is assured that the design entertained by the late William H. Vanderbilt of erecting in New York a museum or national gallery will be carried into execution by his sons. They could not raise a nobler monument to perpetuate the memory of their father.

The San Francisco Alta suggests to the wine-makers of California that they may promote temperance and business at one stroke if they will start wine-shops where pure wines may be sold at 5 cents a glass.

Senator Spooner of Wisconsin made his first speech in the senate chamber, in the form of a eulogy of vice-president Hendricks. Mr. Spooner is described as a "man of scarcely 40, not much above medium height and rather slender, of the blonde type, and with a smoothly shaved face. But he has a strong voice, well under control, a most graceful delivery and a wonderful command of language, which he used to express his brilliant thought with great impressiveness."

Mrs. Grant has just celebrated her 60th birthday by a quiet family reunion at her home in New York.

A prominent physician of Baltimore has been at work on the subject of nervous diseases in children. He finds that insomnia and neuralgia are frequent among children, and traces them directly to mental overpressure.

—Tammany hall's re-election of Mr. Kelly, who is a very sick man, was a gracious and genuine act, for until he acquires strength enough formally to relinquish the position a choice of a successor should not be made. Tammany was never stronger with the great mass of the metropolitan democracy than it is to-day or in better repute with the party in the state and within the federal union.—Brooklyn Eagle, dem.

The young women of a Connecticut town have formed a very laudable organization, known as the "tongue guard." Each member drops a penny in a box every time she says a word against anybody. The money is given to the poor, and poverty is rapidly decreasing in that town.

"One Sunday morning in New York," said Mr. Moody in an address at Cleveland, "there were not so many members in all the evangelical churches as there were people present at an afternoon show by a wild western scout." This indifference of city men toward the churches is what vexes Mr. Moody now.

THE LOST FRIEND.

My friend he was; my friend from all the rest;
With childlike faith he oped to me his breast;
No door was locked on altar, grave, or grief;
No weakness veiled, hidden no disbelief;
The hope, the sorrow, and the wrong were bare,
And ah, the shadow only showed the fair.

I gave him love for love, but deep within
I magnified each frailty into sin;
Each hill-topped foible in the sunset glowed,
Obscuring vales where rivered virtues flowed.
Reproof became reproach, till common grew
The captious word at every fault I knew.
He smiled upon the censorship, and bore
With patient love the touch that wounded sore;
Until at length, so had my blindness grown,
He knew I judged him by his faults alone.

Alone, of all men, I who knew him best,
Refused the gold, to take the dross for test!
Cold strangers honored for the worth they saw;
His friend forgot the diamond in the flaw.

At last it came—the day he stood apart,
When from eyes he proudly veiled his heart;
When carping judgment and uncertain word
A stern resentment in his bosom stirred;
When in his face I read what I had been,
And with his vision saw what he had seen.

Too late! too late! Oh, could he then have known!
When his love died that mine had perfect grown;
That when the veil was drawn, abused, chastised,
The censor stood, the lost one truly prized.

Too late we learn a man must hold his friend
Unjudged, accepted, faultless too the end.

FOOLING WITH A MACHINE.

Human Curiosity Used as a Method of Advertising Cough Drops.

(New York Sun.)

It was on the public square on Canal street, New Orleans. A young man had a rude stand covered with packages of candy, and a couple of kerosene torches lighted up the darkness around him. Near him was a piece of furniture hard to describe. There was an armchair, a canopy over it, and some sort of machinery concealed under the chair; there was a bell which kept ringing, the sound of a music box hidden away, and now and then a drum beat and a faint bugle blast. When a dozen or more spectators had gathered near, the young man opened business by saying: "T-w-o packages of these cough drops for only t-e-n cents and please don't fool with the masheen!"

When he had repeated this statement in a sing-song manner about twenty times, a white man came along, halted, and queried:

"What machine do you refer to?"

"T-w-o packages t-e-n cents, and please don't fool with the masheen!"

"Mighty 'fraid of your old machine, it appears!" growled the man as he approached the object. "I'm down here from Illinois to attend this great world's show, and if there is anything new in machinery I want to see it. What was she built for, anyhow?"

The young man didn't seem to see him. He kept his eyes on the crowd of dark faces in front of him and monotonously repeated:

"T-w-o packages for t-e-n cents—only t-e-n cents, and don't fool with the m-a-s-h-e-e-n!"

"Who's bin foolin' with it?" muttered the man from Illinois. "Don't be so peart over your old invention! I'm some on patents myself, and I believe this ere thing is a fraud, either as a 'tater digger or a corn sheller. What did yer sling her together for, anyhow?"

"And it's t-w-o packages for only t-e-n cents, and don't fool with the masheen!" called the vendor, as he waved a package high in air.

"Nobody wants to fool with it, as I knows on!" remarked the Illinoisan. "However, I'm goin' to see what the durned thing is if I have to lick ye to do it! Reckon it must be a sort o' rocking cheer. Wonder how she operates."

"Cures your cough in half an hour and don't fool with the m-a-s-heen!" drawled the young man, as he made change for a quarter.

"Who's a foolin'?" snapped the man, as he approached closer. "If this is a new thing in rocking cheers I'm going to know it, or my name ain't Grandy. Here goes to try it."

"As I have been sayin'," remarked the young man, "I give you t-w-o packages for t-e-n cents, and—" There was a wild yell from the crowd and a rush. The man from Illinois had no sooner seated himself than he jumped two feet high, pitched forward, and rolled head over heels in the dust, while a bell rang, a drum beat, and a bugle blew toot! toot! toot! The young man never turned his head. Not a soul was left in front of him, but he monotonously continued:

The man from Illinois tries the machine.

"And I warrant 'em to cure your cough in half an hour! Who takes the next package, and please don't fool with the masheen!"

The Illinoisan got up after a moment, brushed off some of the dust and dirt, and then hastened around to the rude counter and fiercely shouted:

"You are an infernal liar and deceiver! Come out here and I'll mop ye over two acres of ground in three minutes! You put up that job a-purpose on me! Come out and be licked!"

There was laughing and shouting and a great uproar, but the young man never changed countenance, never cast a look at the man as he waved a package in each hand and sang out:

"Sure to cure consumption in its first stages! T-w-o packages for t-e-n cents—don't fool with the m-a-sheen!"

The victim backed off, cursing and blowing, and as he reached the sidewalk he shook his fist in a vigorous manner and shouted: "I'll lick you if I have to wait 100 years!"

And the reply came back: "Warranted the best in the market, and don't fool with the m-a-sheen!"

Where Capt. Kidd Would Have Failed.

(Spirit of the Times.)

In one of New York's trotting towns years ago, Splan and Dan Mace were campaigning together. The race was one which Dan desired to win, and he and Splan had taken tickets that way. A third party in the race, whom we will call Johnston, had been consulted, and he agreed to come in. Mace wins the first and second heat, then Johnston wins the next two. He was again consulted, but declared himself out. Mace argued their agreement, but of no avail, so he goes to Splan and says: "We must win it ourselves; Johnston is out."

"We bin win it," says Splan.

They got the word with Johnston at the pole, Splan alongside, and Mace trailing. About the three-quarter pole Splan's sulky got hooked to Johnston's wheel in some way, and Mace won the heat. Mace and Splan both entered the stand at once and protested Johnston's foul driving. He drove to the stand, and without leaving his sulky, said, with an appealing look, while stroking his long gray beard, "Great Scott, Judges, Capt. Kidd on the high seas, in his best days, would stand no chance with those fellows."

Fishy.

(Norristown Herald.)

The petrified skeleton of a whale, over thirty feet long, has been found on a range of mountains in Monterey, Cal., over 3,200 feet above sea level. Local scientists are undecided whether the big fish, when alive, fell out of a balloon and landed on the mountains, or crawled up there and died of mortification after hearing a fish story told by a California fisherman. Both theories are plausible enough.
