Advertise in the Times.

success on," said an old actor. "But the rougher the road and the longer the journey the bigger the dinner at the end of the route," he added.

Louis Massen, the genial leading man of the New York Madison Square theatre, agrees with the old actor. Mr. Massen has made the journey, and he is eating the dinner now, so he is an authority.

It has been about nineteen years since Massen began the trip. At that time he was 11 years old, and with more ambition than prospects he became a call boy in Barnum's museum. Three years later, when that famous old playhouse burned, the boy was cast on his own resources again. These resources were not very extensive. Work was what he was looking for, and when he saw an opening, the fact that it was not a stage door did not deter him from taking advantage of it. For the next three years he hardly saw a theatre, he says, but when his seventeenth birthday came around it brought with it a longing for the queer things of life behind the scenes which he had known while he was a call boy at Barnum's.

He joined the company of Ada Cavendish, and afterward went to the Fifth Avenue theatre. He played big and little parts in many plays. At different times he appeared with Booth, Jefferson, Mary Anderson, Mme. Modjeska, Adelaide Neilson and other famous people of the stage. He took out one or two companies of his own. Sometimes he made money rapidly, sometimes he lost it instantaneously. He learned his trade thoroughly, and when he went to the Madison Square theatre, during the long run of "Hazel Kirke," he knew nearly all that was to be learned of the good features, the bad features, the ups, the downs of theatrical life. Moreover, he knew how to act.

LOUIS MASSEN.

If a necessity should occur to-morrow, Massen could lay aside his actor's costume and shift scenery, work the calcium light, or direct the stage as well as the average expert.

Nor has his experience been drawn wholly from the mystic region behind the footlights. During one of the several breaks in his theatrical work he decided that the most attractive career in the world might be found in a railroad locomotive cab, so he started in to learn to be an engineer. He served an apprenticeship in the Norwich and Worcester machine shops, where he worked hard and advanced rapidly. After six months in the shops he applied for a job as a fireman and got it.

There is a good deal of the dramatic in the lives of the men who drive and groom the great iron monsters of the rail, and Massen was fascinated by the drama until a climax came. One dark and dismal night, when they were dashing down a grade at high speed, the engine jumped the track. Massen says he recalls having heard the engineer cry, "Look out for yourself!" The next thing he remembers is discovering that he was cold and wet, because he was immersed in a bed of half frozen mud up to his neck. With considerable difficulty he extricated himself from his unpleasant position. His bones ached and his body bled from a dozen bruises and scratches. He began to search for the engineer. At last he found him lying where the escaping steam from the wrecked locomotive had scalded him badly. This engineer had been kind to Massen, and a genuine friendship had sprung up between them. When the doctors looked at his wounds they said that they could never heal unless the process known as skin grafting were resorted to. Massen volunteered to allow them to take the skin from him to save his friend. There are thirty-six scars on his arm today to show his devotion to that wounded engineer. But the experience ended Massen's career as a railroad man.

This is only one of many adventures which the young actor has passed through. Yellow fever formed another episode in his career.

He is a pleasant man to meet—dark, six feet tall and perfectly formed—and can always tell a good story, often drawn from his own rich experiences. His handsome face gives evidence of his French descent. His father was an officer in Napoleon's army, and his somewhat reckless daring was fully transmitted to the son. Mr. Massen's dramatic ability doubtless came from his mother, who was a talented and well known actress. Mr. Massen's wife is known to the public as Marie Burroughs, and as one of the most beautiful and accomplished players of emotional roles on the stage. EDWARD MARSHALL.

Boston's Boy Billiardist.

Boston has a young billiardist who takes to the cue as naturally as a duck takes to water, and who bids fair to develop into a player of great proficiency. His name is Frank Stranahan, and his father is proprietor of the Tremont House. Although only entering his teens, young Stranahan has been pronounced by experts to be a coming light in the world of billiards and the most wonderful boy player in the country. Few amateur billiardists in Boston can hold their own with him. Champion Jacob Schaefer and "Boy Wonder" Frank Ives have both played with him, and commented upon his remarkable skill, and the former showed his admiration in a substantial manner by presenting young Stranahan with a handsome cue.

played unusual talent as a horseman, and was soon winning laurels as a jockey. He rode Harry Bassett to victory in his great race with Longfellow at Saratoga. In 1883 Rowe joined the Dwyer Bros., and did much toward pushing their colors toward the front. Miss Woodford, Hindoo, Runnymede, Luke Blackburn and other flyers were developed by him.

For three years past he has been doing good work for the Belmont stables. He considers Luke Blackburn the best horse he ever trained. Rowe's turf career has been quite remunerative, for the stable boy of 1868 is said to be a capitalist, worth $150,000 in 1891.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

One of the scenes in "A High Roller," which will be sent out next season, will be an interior view of the Manhattan club, which occupies the famous A. T. Stewart mansion in New York city.

Louis Harrison is again starring in "The Pearl of Pekin."

Edwin Booth's health, he says, is good, but on the few times recently when he has been seen on the street he used a heavy stick and walked apparently with considerable difficulty. Not long ago he witnessed a performance of Barrett's tragedy, "Ganelon," from a box.

Julia Marlowe is much improved in health, and will soon go south.

The new Lyceum theatre at Duluth is nearly completed.

It is said that Joseph Arthur, author of "The Still Alarm" and "Blue Jeans," is at work on a new play to be produced in the season of '93-94. It is to be wholly different in general character from Mr. Arthur's previous efforts. According to the gossip of people who ought to know it will be strongly emotional instead of sensational.

The long run of "The Old Homestead," with Denham Thompson in the leading role, has ended in New York. This was brought about, not because the piece had begun to lose money, but because the actors in it had played their parts so often that they had become unbearable.

A Great Grand Stand.

Here is a picture of the mammoth grand stand in process of construction by the Coney Island Jockey club, at Sheepshead Bay. It is to be composed principally of iron, and will have a length of 640 feet. About 11,000 people can easily be taken care of, and between races, if they feel inclined, a large percentage of the 11,000 may walk up and down a promenade 15 feet wide which stretches the entire length of stand. The mammoth roof will also afford standing room for an immense number of people, who will be able to watch the whole course easily from this coign of vantage. The basement will be open, and the capacity of the old betting ring doubled. A cafe with sixty tables will also be one of the new stand's features.
