A SUMMER EPISODE.

She was very young and correspondingly foolish, or she would never have thought of such a thing. But she did think of it, and sitting down upon the bank of the little stream she looked carefully about her first and then slipped off her dainty kid shoes and dainty silken hose and laid them beside her.

Then she dipped one small foot into the water and shivered, but putting it back again she grew bolder, and finally, catching up her skirts to prevent their getting wet, she stepped down from the bank and walked gingerly out into the little brook.

For the last two weeks she had longed to do just this, for she had not "waded" since she was a mere slip of a girl, and now that the opportunity offered she had taken advantage of it without the slightest hesitation.

The clear water rippled around her slim ankles for a moment as she stepped in, and then as she moved cautiously along the smooth bottom it rose about the pretty rounded limbs and gurgled around them and laved them as if it recognized the priceless privilege it was taking. She laughed as she heard and felt it—a happy, childish laugh—and, stooping, thrust her hand into the cool waters and picked up some pebbles from the bottom. An impudent robin, swinging on a willow near by, cocked his head upon one side as she did this and eyed the latter day nymph with birdish approval from head to foot, while she steadied herself for a moment and threw the small stones at him.

As she stooped to get another handful of ammunition—for of course she missed the robin—suddenly there came floating by her just beyond her reach a something which struck her dumb with consternation for a moment. It was a pretty band of yellow elastic, with a huge bow of like hued ribbon and a dainty gold buckle on one side of it, and not two minutes before she had left it upon the bank with her stockings and shoes and the other something, which was black. And now it had the impudence to follow her example and try the water and was floating serenely by her as she stared at it.

With a desperate little jump she sprang after it, but the wicked bit of silk and elastic and gold only floated still further out of her reach, and the next minute was caught in the current of the stream, and had slipped rapidly away from her, and was fast disappearing around the little bend ahead. And the buckle and bow were triumphantly resting upon the crest of the tiny waves.

"Oh, you hateful thing!" she cried. "I hope you'll sink and never be found again. If any one should pick you up"— But the awfulness of this suggestion was too much for her, and she splashed tearfully back to where the other lay and sat down upon the bank, one foot stirring angrily at the sand just in the edge of the water while she thought.

Five minutes later Dick Hardesty, a few hundred yards below where she sat, looked up from his novel from where he lay in a cool retreat beside the stream and saw a peculiar little boat come floating his way.

Wondering what it could be, he turned over lazily and fished it out of the water with a twig and placed it carefully on his palm to gaze at. As he did so a smile of mingled triumph and satisfaction came over his pleasant face.

"This is lucky, by Jove!" he said to himself, looking closely at the buckle which had refused to sink the dainty ship. "D. L. K.—as I live, it's Dorothy's. And if that's the case I"— Then he stopped and chuckled to himself with glee, and getting to his feet he folded the bit of silk and gold, from which he had shaken the water, carefully up and placed it in his pocket. Then he started cautiously up the stream, upon a voyage of discovery perhaps.

Two days before Dorothy had refused him—it was her second proposal only—and had laughed at him when he looked rather cut up over it. It was his time to laugh now and hers to look worried, for he intended to have his revenge and the girl in the bargain.

When he reached the secluded little pool where she had ventured, he found her curled up on the opposite bank with a very woebegone yet determined look about her mouth and her skirts well spread out, as if she had heard him coming and had been warned in time.

For a moment Dick did not speak. Then he said smilingly:

"Why, Miss Dorothy, who would expect to find you here? Lovely day, isn't it?"

She colored slightly, for she knew he was merely trying to prolong her embarrassment, and determined not to let him see how very disconcerted she was.

But though she kept silent Dick could not refrain from smiling as he caught sight of a bare foot, which showed beneath her skirts now, and catching his glance she burst out furiously:

"Dick, I want you to go away this very minute. Do you hear me? Right away!"

"I do, my darling," replied Dick gravely, "but I'm sorry to say I can't do what you want me to in this case—at least not right away. I came to make a bargain with you," he added, and then he drew from his pocket the dainty garter.

"Do you want it?" said he.

No answer.

"For if you do I'm willing to part with it—for a consideration. Take back that answer you gave me the other day—reverse your decision, in fact—and this is yours. Will you?"

"Give me that—that hateful thing!" she cried, not deigning to answer him.

"Certainly, dear, as soon as you say that you'll have me. Otherwise—well, it has the full initials, you know," and he began to wrap it up again carefully.

She hesitated for a moment, with the tears of vexation brimming over her pretty eyes, and then she gave up.

"No, no, no!" she cried. "Don't you dare to, Dick. You shall not. I say you—oh, you wicked, hateful wretch! Yes, then, if I must say it! Now, give it to me quick and turn your back till I count a hundred."

And he did so, with a quiet smile of contentment.—E. J. Appleton in Cincinnati Post.

Found a Cure for Sciatic Rheumatism.

Mrs. A. Inveen, residing at 720 Henry St., Alton, Ill., suffered from sciatic rheumatism for over eight months. She doctored for it nearly the whole of this time, using various remedies recommended by friends, and was treated by the physicians, but received no relief. She then used one and a half bottles of Chamberlain's Pain Balm, which affected a complete cure. This is published at her request, as she wants others similarly afflicted to know what cured her.
