Cornell Highway Research to Save Millions on Roads

A process that promises to keep streets and highways from buckling in severe winter weather is being tested at the N. Y. State College of Agriculture, Cornell University.

The method has proved effective in keeping sensitive soils from expanding under laboratory conditions much more severe than those found in nature. Researchers at Cornell say that, if initial success continues, the technique may save New York farmers million of dollars now written off in frost damage.

Severe winter weather causes much of the state's farmland to heave and buckle, exposing sensitive roots to freezing temperatures. Low temperatures also cause highways to expand and crack, sometimes leaving rough spots and gaping holes which cost taxpayers large sums each year in highway repair bills.

Under the direction of Prof. Robert Miller, Cornell scientists have found that some salts can prevent this. Most effective has been gypsum. Soils treated with gypsum and placed in a freezer show little or no expansion, while untreated soils in similar conditions expand more than ten times their original size.

"Gypsum appears especially promising because it [illegible] dissolve and [illegible] season after season," Miller says. He wants farmers eventually to expect crops growing protected from [illegible] which happen to contain gypsum. "Most fertilizers don't have enough gypsum to keep soils from expanding in cold weather," he explains.

The Cornell researchers are also studying the chemical reasons for frost heaving.

Free Tax Help Booklets at Revenue Office

The self-help program of the Internal Revenue Service includes several advantages not usually found in most do-it-yourself activities, District Director R. H. Reichel of the Syracuse office said today.

The 1960 program for 1959 Federal income tax return filers already is underway, Mr. Reichel said.

"The theme of self-help," Mr. Reichel declared, "is that the taxpayer complete as much of his return as possible before seeking help from us. First of all he should read the return form carefully along with the instruction booklet accompanying it.

"If the taxpayer finds he cannot solve a problem presented by his return, there are various avenues of help open to him. He can call us during office hours. He can visit his local office to obtain the help he needs.

"Taxpayer assistance days are best because we put on duty as many agents as possible on those days, but help is offered every day from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., Monday through Friday.

"Neither of these office contacts may be necessary if the taxpayer obtains a copy of one of the new Internal Revenue Service tax guides most closely related to his problem—Your Federal Income Tax, or Tax Guide for Small Business, or the Farmer's Tax Guide."

These tax guides are available at the Syracuse office.
