Coughs Lead to Consumption

By John A. Dieh

Almost the first indication of that dreaded malady, consumption, is a cough. Often it is not a severe cough, just a slight hacking that does not seem to mean much as a symptom.

Medical science has armed itself with weapons against tuberculosis. The fight may be long and serious but it can be won, if the patient gives full co-operation.

The first step of course is to consult a capable practitioner. Any delay makes recovery longer, more doubtful. Never neglect a cough, no matter how slight. It is Nature's first warning.

If the doctor shakes his head over the cough and prescribes a strict regimen of living, such as rest, a well rounded diet, perhaps a drier climate, do not neglect a single word of his advice.

Along with his advice, he will prescribe medicines designed to assist your recovery. Take that prescription to an experienced pharmacist.

Sentinels of Health
Don't Neglect Them!
Nature designed the kidneys to do a marvelous job. Their task is to keep the flowing blood stream free of an excess of toxic impurities. The act of living—life itself—is constantly producing waste matter the kidneys must remove from the blood if good health is to endure.
When the kidneys fail to function as Nature intended, there is retention of waste that may cause body-wide distress. One may suffer nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—feel tired, nervous, all worn out.
Frequent, scanty or burning passages may be further evidence of kidney or bladder disturbance.
The recognized and proper treatment is a diuretic medicine to help the kidneys get rid of excess poisonous body waste. Use Doan's Pills. They have had more than forty years of public approval. Are endorsed the country over. Insist on Doan's. Sold at all drug stores.

St. Bernard Dogs Swiss Heroes as Life-Savers

So universal is the fame of the St. Bernard dogs that it goes without saying that they rank first among the aristocracy of Switzerland's canine world. Their home, as their name suggests, is the Great St. Bernard Hospice, founded over 1,000 years ago by Bernard de Menthon, a saintly priest, and inhabited up to this day by brethren of the Order of St. Augustine, states a writer in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Winter lasts from eight to nine months in that isolated mountain region and the snow is sometimes piled up as high as 12 to 15 feet. Blizzards are sudden and descend with such fury that many travelers would surely perish were it not for the vigilance and devotion of the monks and their marvelously trained dogs.

Historic records show that the Hospice was without any dogs up to 1670 A. D. From then on the brethren kept a few watch dogs, but it is not clearly established of what breed they were. These animals soon took delight in accompanying their masters on their many errands of mercy and were quickly appreciated for their unerring sense of location.

The race which has for the last 250 years been described as St. Bernards has, according to a noted naturalist, been gradually developed by the monks through careful breeding and training in life-saving work.

The short-haired variety is the original kind. In 1830 some of the brethren decided to cross their dogs with Newfoundlands, in order to raise animals which would be protected against the inclement climate with longer hair. However, this crossing did not affect the physical characteristics of the St. Bernards, and only the hair became longer.

Fingers Our First Forks; Hands, Earliest Spoons

In these civilized days it is difficult to realize that our first forks were our fingers and the earliest spoons the hollow of our hands, observes a writer in the Montreal Herald.

The spoon is thought to be older than the knife and fork. According to the fashion of the Middle ages it was carried in a case in the belt of the wearer, with other table tools. The cases were frequently as handsome as the tools.

From the Sixteenth century more cutlery sets were made. As in modern times, they were often given as presentation sets. Many fine old silver spoons are still prized as family heirlooms. The seal-top, the rattail and the fiddle were three popular designs and the fiddle pattern is used today.

Unlike knife blades, the bowls of spoons were seldom etched or engraved. Early spoons were of bone, ivory, and wood.

Ancient Patriarch Ruled

The ancient patriarch ruled his family; there was little defying of parental authority and virtually no recognized age of manhood or womanhood. The Chinese not only reverenced the old but believed that the older a man became the wiser he grew. Much the same idea was held in ancient Rome. The senate was the most powerful of the governing bodies and was composed of the heads of the most important or influential families. In most cases nothing could be considered by the other body without senate consent and usually if the senate said "no" that settled any matter. The word "senate" is of Latin origin, meaning "old man," but literally it refers to an assembly of elders.

Many Kinds of "Rheumatism"

There are many kinds of "rheumatism." The main varieties are inflamatory or rheumatic fever, the chronic condition known as arthritis, and muscular rheumatism. Rheumatic fever is an infectious disease most commonly found in children and young people. It is rarely fatal, but quite serious because the germ causing it may attack the heart. Arthritis makes the joints stiff, swollen and deformed. It seldom kills people, but if not checked, causes great suffering and interference with work. Muscular rheumatism usually yields to rest, heat and massage, but chronic cases may refuse to yield until the cause is discovered and removed.

Gestalt Psychology

Gestalt is a German word that was introduced into psychology in 1890 to indicate the character of a perception as a unity. For instance, the seeing of a square does not consist in seeing four equal straight lines inclosing four right angles, but is the perception of the square as a whole. Similarly, a melody is the totality of a series of tones, not the sum of the separate tones. Bertrand Russell defines Gestalt psychology as the psychology of form, dealing with the apprehension of wholes. He says that "reading is a case in point."

Salt Long in Use

Salt has been used in all ages and all civilizations. Some of the oldest of trade routes came into use for the traffic in salt. It was probably first used as an ailment when men was in transition from the nomadic stage to the settled, agricultural life. The Indians, though no such salt users as the civilized races, felt the need for it as all animals do and obtained it, like the wild beasts, at the licks and salt springs found in many places. In the coastal regions they usually got it from the sinks and ponds of the tide lands.

The Library Alcove

By MABEL RICHARDS

© McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service.

MISS JOSEPHINE JENNER celebrated her thirty-eighth birthday by purchasing a shiny brass padlock for the new shiny black gate. With curved red lips set in the firm line of duty, her soft, appealing brown eyes tense with responsibility, she walked firmly across the reading room of the university library, down the dim hallway, and began to mount the stairs leading to the quiet alcove. Her cheeks, usually as delicately pink and white as apple blossoms in spring, were flushed with excitement to a deep rose. On her smooth white forehead appeared a very determined, very competent frown. Miss Josephine Jenner, librarian, was looking at the gate.

Halfway up the stairs it stood, new and black and uncompromising, blocking the way to the dim, cosy little alcove above. Down these stairs for nearly four college generations, Miss Josephine Jenner had watched couples come, smiling into each other's eyes; had watched them touch hands with a little catch of the breath; had watched them pass, unconcious of her disapproving gaze, seeing nothing but each other, toward the door.

Silly, what they could see in the evening spent in the library, sitting in a tiny alcove lined with musty books. The first two she had watched come down from that solitude, eighteen years ago, had been Jim Matthews and Rose Cubley. And last week—the first week of college this year—when she had heard laughing and voices, and had mounted the stairs quickly, she had found little Jeanette Mathews, now a freshman, sitting on the table, teaching a new song to a tall senior with curly hair.

It was then that Miss Josephine, grim determination in her face, had decided to put an end to the whole business, and purchase the gate. And now all that remained was to lock it, and an end to foolishness. And to even worse than foolishness. For as Jeanette and her senior had come down the stairs, the horrified librarian had most certainly seen two shadows merge a breathless moment into one!

Having snapped the padlock with an indignant and scandalized click, Miss Josephine Jenner turned to find herself looking into the gray eyes of Professor Archibald Matthews. Understanding eyes, they were, with something quizzical twinkling in them, as he said, "Good evening, Miss Jenner. I see you're 'givin 'em the gate'!"

"Well, my only regret is that I didn't do it years ago. It's strange to me what they see in it, sitting on a table or a folding chair, surrounded by those old bound volumes of the 'Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science' or the 'Psychological Review.' They must be crazy!"

Miss Josephine looked up at Professor Matthews for his confirmation. His head bent ever so gently over hers. Jim Matthews' older brother, slim, distinguished bachelor, was looking down at her with a strange new expression in his gray eyes. Miss Josephine looked away quickly, conscious of a slow surge of pink rising upon her cheeks.

"I've often wondered just what's up there, anyway," he said, after a moment. "Do you—could I—I mean, would you show it to me?"

With a caught breath, Miss Josephine unlocked the gate and they went up the stairs together.

It was the same old alcove that Miss Josephine had rearranged and dusted and unwillingly chaperoned for the past eighteen years. Yet there was something different about it today. There was an intimacy about the two folding chairs which faced each other across the little table. There was something a little mysterious and thrilling about the seclusion of it. There was somethis breath-taking about almost anything or almost nothing, and looking into the gray eyes of Professor Archibald Matthews.

It was nearly an hour later that Miss Josephine remembered that she ought to be at the desk. When she came to close the gate Archie (he had asked her to call him Archie, as she used to do in the days when they had gone to school together, before he went away) closed it for her, and gently snapped the lock.

At the foot of the stairs they encountered Jeanette Matthews and the senior with the curly hair.

"You've put up a gate!" cried the senior with astonishment.

"Hello, Uncle Archie," said Jeanette. "Why," her voice rose in quick dismay, "The gate's locked!"

The senior looked confidently at Miss Josephine. "Oh, please, Miss Jenner, won't you give us the key?"

The habit of disapproval wavered about Miss Josephine's lips, though her eyes were wide with a new wonder.

"I'm sorry," she began, "but—"

Just then, in the dusk of the hallway, she felt Archie's hand brush hers.

"Oh, yes," said Miss Josephine tremulously, "I'll give you the key. I'll—I'll give you the whole gate!"

If Jeanette and her senior, happily climbing toward the alcove, had looked backward toward the foot of the stairs, they would most certainly have seen two shadows merge for a breathless moment into one.
