Discipline Must Fit Child, Parents, Teachers Advised

To puzzled, worried parents and teachers who feel that the old disciplinary methods don't work but who think that the modern way is "no discipline at all," Dr. Dorothy W. Baruch explains how we can fashion discipline to fit the child and suit ourselves, making it a creative undertaking instead of a mechanical thing.
Dr. Baruch does not give specific remedies for specific problems but outlines some useful principles that hold good "whether a child is two or ten-age."
The essential fact that every parent must know, the author states, is that "bad feelings cause bad actions."
And the three kinds of "bad feelings" that cause most kinds of misbehavior are expressed in this way: "I'm feeling hurt... I'm feeling angry... I'm feeling scared."
These "bothers," stored up inside, may pop out in different ways: "Sue, at six, grabs from every child in the neighborhood; at sixteen, she steals. Both problems are her way of saying, at different ages, 'I'm hurt. I never get enough loving. I feel mean and want something tangible to make up for the lack.'"
The hurts that "pop out" in fear and anger and misbehavior can be prevented, Dr. Baruch points out, by feeding the "emotional hunger" of the child for the three basic foods of love, understanding and success.
"The best way to give a child of any age enough loving is really to love him." And really loving a child, Dr. Baruch explains, means having good feelings inside ourselves about him... means learning to know him as an individual, for the child needs most to count on our understanding his "bad" feelings as well as his good ones.

Quick Test for Newcastle Announced by Veterinarians

A quick new test for Newcastle disease—now one of the nation's most widespread poultry maladies—has been announced by research veterinarians.
Former tests have required laboratory work to identify the disease. The new test, however, can be applied by veterinarians on the farm.
It is similar to a rapid test now widely used in diagnosing pullorum disease in poultry flocks.
It requires only a drop of blood from each bird and results are obtained in two to five minutes.
Two veterinarians at the University of Minnesota developed the test. Their report indicates that it is practical and reliable for checking farm flocks, since large numbers of birds can be tested in a short time.
Testing for Newcastle disease is essential because the symptoms of this infection can easily be confused with those of other diseases.
The disease is highly contagious among chickens and is responsible for many poultry deaths and heavy losses in egg production in the United States. Caused by a virus, it was first detected near Newcastle upon Tyne, England, nearly 25 years ago. Since then, it has spread widely throughout the world.
If the new test fulfills its promise, it will give poultry raisers and veterinarians a head start on fighting Newcastle disease when the test shows this infection is present.

Waffle Iron
An easy way to clean the grids of a waffle iron is to place a paper napkin soaked with household ammonia between the grids and leave it overnight. The ammonia loosens the brown "cooked on" accumulation of grease. Then it may be wiped off or rubbed off with steel wool. (This cleaning method may also be used for the inside of toasters.)

Save Locker Space
To conserve locker space in the freezer, you may want to bone some of the meat you butcher this winter. A beef carcass of medium or commercial grade will bone out about 60 pounds of lean meat for each 100 pounds of carcass.
