The housing crunch here crimpes life for poor

Statistics from the 1980 census show that the median monthly rent in Rockland was $295, higher than all but five counties in the United States. Recent statistics show that the poor are being squeezed by the housing crunch, as well.

One problem, while quite common for battered women, could be solved by a group of Rockland officials. A Sandy Hook-based women's shelter, a temporary shelter for battered women in Rockland, has been in operation for three years. The shelter is filled with women patients, some of whom have been battered by their husbands in the last few years.

Most of the places are $450 or more for a one-bedroom apartment. The result is that you have to go through the papers and you see the same place again.

Part of the problem is that there are not enough quality housing for everyone, according to a government survey, which is in the process of releasing this report.

The solution is not easy, but the federal government has funded a variety of rental housing programs. That could include the sites of the former factories, such as the Rockland Navy Yards, which are now being used to provide a variety of housing for the homeless.
