Kate Field's Lecture.

Miss Kate Field is par excellence a rider of hobbies. Her latest is Dickens, and she, last night, galloped him at full speed over one of the largest audiences gathered at the Opera House during the present course. She heard him read on twenty-five evenings, and holds at least twelve times as high an opinion of his biestronic powers as we, who only heard him twice.

If an overdose of Dickens could be made palatable, this talented and graceful lady would charm away all feeling of surfeit, but there is reason in all things, and because Dickens was so distinguished a novelist, is no excuse for such absorbing hero worship. Miss Field believes in Dickens, and with true feminine logic exalts him, because she likes him. She has, to misappropriate one of her own comparisons, "swallowed Dickens," and if, like the girl in the fairy tale, her words are pearls, they all bear the monogram more or less distinctly, "C. D."

Aside from the wholesale and unreasonable eulogies in which the lecture abounded, it was really a delightful affair. She attempted no such scholarly analysis of his character and genius as is given by Mr. Curtis. She has not the depth of thought for that, but she stated her opinions with feminine positiveness, and then illustrated them by apt quotations or anecdotes from the works or life of her hero. Her elocution is peculiar and a trifle indistinct; in the more serious portions of the lecture, and in the recitations of Dickens' little poem, it is wonderfully sweet and pathetic.

Miss Fields is not so sympathetic a speaker as Miss Dickinson and other ladies we have heard on the rostrum, and her audience, though attentive and pleased, were not remarkably demonstrative. She has studied Dickens thoroughly, and the hundred distinct characters he has given to literature were nearly all brought before the audience, and not only named, but photographed in a short descriptive phrase, or made to speak for themselves in some familiar sentence. We are grateful for the appreciative words of the gentle critic, although they might be fitter if less exaggerated, and to the Y. M. C. A. for the pleasure given in introducing her to an Auburn audience.

MR. BARTHOLOMEW'S LECTURE.—At the request of a number of persons who heard Rev. Mr. Bartholomew's most interesting "talk" at the High School yesterday on the "Prairies and Coal Field of the West" we print the following synopsis of the lecture from notes taken by our reporter:

The Speaker stated that he came before his audience with considerable embarrassment because Mr. Dwight was expected to deliver the address, and because he had been announced through the papers as giving a lecture on the "Prairies and Coal Fields of the West." What he did propose to give was a familiar talk, not an elaborate essay on a topic to which Appleton's Encyclopedia alone devotes thirteen closely printed pages.

Alluding to that undefined region which we call the West, he said few people had any adequate idea of its resources and its vast extent. We had a more definite impression of the size of European Nations than of this portion of our own domain. Single States and those not the largest, contained more square miles than all England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. Yet what a place those nations held in history, and what a glorious future lay before the West, when a teeming population should develop all its wealth of minerals, agriculture trade and manufactures.

The State of Illinois was chosen as best illustrating the themes selected, and an eloquent description given of her natural scenic beauties:—the wonderful "Starved Rock" with its romantic Indian legends, the "Iron Mountain" just across the river, which would furnish iron for a thousand Pacific railroads; the famous "Robbers Cave" nearly as large as the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, and filled with rooms that seem like fairy palaces. These were named as instances of what nature had done for our country, and those glibish tourists who can see no beauty or romance outside of English scenery, or continental ruins, received a pointed and deserved rebuke.

The wonders of the prairies; what they are and what causes produced them, were then considered. The descriptions given were fine specimens of word painting, or to use a better phrase, of word photography, presenting a clear impression of the objects before his hearers; and the scientific theories were named with references to, and quotations from authorities, surprising in an unstudied and extempore address.

The opinion to which he held was that these level surfaces were once ocean beds, and the absence of trees was accounted for by the periodical burning of the grasses by the Indians, and in days before the advent of man, by natural causes such as lightning. The facts urged in support of this theory were given and seem reasonable if not conclusive.

The vast coal fields of the State were then described, underlying 40,000 square miles and counting all the layers averaging a thickness of sixteen feet. The coal fields of England underlie about 11,000 square miles and at the present rate of consumption will last about a thousand years. Those of America will last a million years and beyond that the speaker said he had no interest whatever.

The theory of the vegetable origin of coal was briefly given and the different varieties named and described. In conclusion the people of the West were humorously described, and the peculiarities of Indiana "Hoosiers," Ohio "Buckeyes" and Illinois "Suckers" were genially presented and commented upon.

We regret that space will not permit a fuller publication of our report. We have only been able to give the outlines of this instructive address, which hardly do it justice. The speaker succeeded admirably in that most difficult task of making a dry scientific topic exceedingly interesting, and combined instruction and amusement in the most felicitous manner.

Cough, Catarrh, Consumption.

Dr. C. P. HOWE.—We are using your Concentrated Syrup. My mother has been taking it for a terrible cough, which has troubled her for some time.—She would cough an raise in this catarrh or consumption at least one quart of matter or corruption from her lungs each night. We had to keep watchers every night to keep her from strangling. It seems as if she must die; but she commenced taking your Concentrated Syrup, and in a few weeks we dismissed the watchers, and mother is almost well. She has got over the cough, and getting strong again. She continues to take your syrup. She is now over 78 years old. Yours, truly, MRS. P. CALDWELL.
