Cornelius Vanderbilt.

Commodore Vanderbilt died at his residence in New York city yesterday at 10:51 A. M., after a lingering illness of more than six months. He had suffered from a combination of diseases, and his great age (eighty-three) had lessened his powers of endurance, so that since Tuesday it has been apparent to his physicians that at most he could live only a few days or a week.

Cornelius Vanderbilt was born on Staten Island May 27th, 1794. His father was a humble farmer, and his mother was a woman of much thrift and energy of character—qualities which she impressed indelibly upon her son. He received but a common school education, and little of that, for he did not take to study. Neither did he take to farming, but when at work in his father's fields used to look with longing at the ships coming and going in the harbor. His ambition in this direction paved the way for his great business fortune.

On his sixteenth birthday his mother advanced him one hundred dollars to purchase a boat. Proud enough he went and purchased his boat, but in navigating it home sailed on a sunken wreck and just managed to run her ashore when she filled and sunk. Nothing daunted, he pumped out his ship, patched her up, went to work and cleared a thousand dollars during each of the three succeeding summers. Young Vanderbilt worked hard and saved his earnings, and by 1818 he possessed three small vessels and a cash capital of nine hundred dollars.

About this time he surprised his friends and rivals by deliberately abandoning his flourishing business to accept the post of captain of a small steamboat at a salary of one thousand dollars a year. Captain Vanderbilt was among the first to discover that the supremacy of sails was gone forever, and he resolved to ally himself to the new power of steam before being overcome by it. The next twelve years of his life he spent in commanding the steamer plying between New York and New Brunswick, N. J., his wife (he married his cousin, Miss Sophia Johnson, in 1813) meanwhile adding to his earnings by keeping the hotel at New Brunswick.

By 1829 Mr. Vanderbilt had accumulated, with the aid of his wife, nearly $30,000. He then built the "Caroline," the first steamer ever owned by him. He ran his boat against fierce opposition for a time, but triumphed, and then his advance was steady. He built other boats, in 1851 established the famous Nicaragua line of steamers from New York to California, and afterward started a transatlantic line, which he ran for several years.

But it was in 1857 that the flood-tide of his fortune began to set in. He was then sixty-three years of age—and old man then, as men go, yet he had not even commenced the great enterprises which made him so wealthy and famous. He had become what was then termed a rich man, and had earned his title of "Commodore" by being the foremost steamboat owner of his day. About this time he turned his attention to railroad matters. Harlem railroad stock was then selling at the ruinous figure of 0¼ cents. He quietly bought the stock, and in 1858 had a controlling interest. Under his sagacious management of the road the stock rapidly rose in market, and for years has ruled from twenty to forty per cent. above par. In the same way, when he found opportunity, and with some of the proceeds of his Harlem investment he bought a controlling interest in the New Jersey Railroad Company, whose stock at once for similar reasons, rapidly rose in value. Next he turned his attention to the Hudson River road, and the public were soon given to understand that it had passed under his control by the unexpected announcement that fares on it and Harlem road would be the same, and that tickets would be good on either road.

The acquisition of these two roads brought him in rivalry with the New York Central. Mr. Corning, its president, secured the nominal support of Mr. Vanderbilt, and when an attempt was made to supersede him in 1864 Mr. Vanderbilt lent him the influence of half a million of stock, thus proving how rapidly the Commodore had accumulated wealth. Two years later he acquired control of the road. At the annual election, held in December, 1867, only one vote was cast. It represented thirteen millions of stock, and was deposited by the sole voter, Cornelius Vanderbilt. This made him president of the road. The stock was in part held as proxy for other men, but it gave him the wished-for power. In two years the stock was increased from twenty-four millions to forty-eight. The immense accumulation of dividends enabled the Commodore to buy stock at the rate of two millions a year, and it was not long before he owned personally the largest part of the Central Railroad. This he consolidated with the Hudson River road, thus forming one line from New York to Buffalo.

Having been thus far successful, it became necessary for him to control the Lake Shore road, in order to compete with the other lines to Chicago. This was accomplished by heavy purchases of that stock at a high price, and his son-in-law, Horace F. Clarke, was made president. On Mr. Clarke's sudden death the Commodore was put in his son-in-law's place. In 1867-8 Mr. Vanderbilt also sought to obtain control of his leading rival, the Erie, but after a vigorous effort he failed and withdrew from that enterprise.

Mr. Vanderbilt's wealth is estimated at about $85,000,000. Though so wealthy, he was not greatly noted for his charities. In 1862 he presented the government with the "Vanderbilt," a new steamer of 5,000 tons, worth $800,000, for which Congress passed him a vote of thanks. Two years ago, through the influence of his second wife, a Southern lady, he gave $500,000 to establish the Vanderbilt University, at Nashville, Tenn., under the auspices of the Southern Methodist Church; and a year ago, he added another half million dollars to the endowment of the same institution. He also built the Church of the Strangers, in New York city, and gave a life lease of it to Dr. Deems, whose salary he has also paid. If Mr. Vanderbilt has given any other benefactions or charities, they are not known to the world.

By his first wife Mr. Vanderbilt had a family of thirteen children. Of his sons, Wm. H. Vanderbilt is the oldest and inherits much of his father's ability, and will succeed to his position in railroad and financial circles. Cornelius, Jr., is another son. Of his daughters one is the widow of Horace F. Clarke, another the wife of Daniel Torrance, and the youngest is Madame La Fitte, of Paris. He had no children by his second wife.

Another Coal Combination Proposed.

The New York Tribune says that the coal operators are considering the possibility of a new combination to control the anthracite production. A meeting of miners and shippers have resolved that measures be taken to reduce the supply of coal to the real demands. No action has yet been taken by the large companies. They favor combination if there is a general co-operation.

The Ashtabula Horror.

STATEMENTS OF THREE SURVIVORS.

Special Dispatch to the N. Y. World.

ASHTABULA, O. January 1.—H. J. Tomlinson, a general insurance agent at Memphis, Tenn., was on the sleeper Palatine. He thinks there were thirty persons aboard this car, which was the third from the end of the train. He had just looked at his watch, which showed 8:05, New York time, when the bell-rope broke, and he felt a sudden shock, like that of a collision. Then he could feel what seemed like wheels off the track, bumping over ties for, say, the length of the car. Then came a sensation of sinking down—down. It seemed as if it would never stop. He thought of everything that had ever happened to him, everything he had ever done or was going to do, of his wife, family, friends—everything that belonged to him, even to a $175 flute, which he had just got from New York, and which was in the charge of the porter. There! thought he; that flute will be crushed to pieces. He never thought but that he would himself escape with his life. He watched the end of the cars as they went down. First, as has been said, he thought they had collided. He had had some experience of railroad accidents before, and expected to be thrown upon one side of the track or the other, but this sensation of going on over a chasm on an even keel and down the whole way for such a distance on the same even keel—for from the apparent time the distance seemed almost endless—this sensation was indescribably wonderful. He had heard the roar of the other cars breaking, but the terrible crash of glass and iron and wood he could yet hear and feel. Then came a blank, and the next he knew he was lying in the snow looking at the tall piers, with the blank between now filled only by the whirling snow where a few minutes before had been the 150 feet of iron bridge, which had fallen with them 75 feet into the bed of the river. Then his eyes rested on the blazing cars stretched all the way across the space. Beside him were two or three men, one of whom was C. H. Tyler, of the firm of Whedon, Tyler & Co., of St. Louis, who had been in the same car with Tomlinson, and to whom he feels confident, he owes his escape from death. Tyler escaped with only slight injury to one hand. Tomlinson was propped up in the pump-house, where, lighting a cigar to ease his pain, he felt thankful that his injuries were not so great as those of the many mangled shapes which soon filled the building. Soon came Mayor Hepburn, of Ashtabula, who, with the greatest kindness, invited him to his house, where he now lies with a broken wrist, injured hips and bruised head.

C. E. Jones, of Beloit, Wis., who was in the first passenger car and escaped with slight injuries, says he had just gone to the first sleeper, the Palatine, to engage a birth, the only one not taken, and was returning for his baggage when the accident happened. While passing through he noticed the coaches were quite full and the other cars more so than the first, the one he had ridden in, which he thinks had two persons to at least two thirds of the seats. The smoker especially seemed crowded. "Our car," he says, "sank down swiftly but seemingly for long, long minutes. I expected to be killed, of course, and of all the events of life, great and small, thought of holding my business card tight for identification. I did not think of its burning. The crash came when our car lighted and was jammed immovable. Another crash came as another car dashed down on us. I was nearly free, being protected over head by the trucks. Our car seemed to fall in kindling-wood around me—kinding wood, indeed, in which the fire was just catching from the stove. I got out in its lurid light by a strong effort."

Martin Jefferson, from Ohio, with his wife and two children, was on the train, and all were rescued. He heard a wailing cry of "Ben Martin, where are you?" and went to the assistance of a woman who then said: "Oh it's no use; I'm all broken to pieces." But he lifted her by her uninjured arm and had to step into some water, where lay, it seems, a man, who clutched him by both legs and dragged him down into the creek. Then the man himself got up, apparently uninjured, and unconcernedly walked off and disappeared in the storm. He again picked up Mrs. Martin, and with some other help she was carried to a place of safety. This lady has since been prematurely delivered of a child. Jefferson is sure many more might have been saved could water have been directed on the wreck from hose in time. He feels sure that there were at least three hundred persons on the train.

—The late octegenarian governor of the Persian province of Fars, upon retiring from office, had his soles beaten until he disgorged $200,000 and promised to disgorge $100,000 more of his ill-gotten wealth

—Counting by states the Speakership of the House of Representatives has been held by Pennsylvania three times, by Connecticut once, by New Jersey three times, by Maryland once, by Massachusetts six times, by North Carolina three times, for three successive Congresses, and by one man, Nathaniel Macon; by Kentucky eight times, Henry Clay being Speaker; by New York twice, by Virginia seven times, by New Hampshire once, by Tennessee three times, James K. Polk being twice Speaker; by Indiana five times, Schuyler Colfax being Speaker three of those five times; by South Carolina once, and by Maine three times.

ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

OF

Foreign Literature.

THIRTY-THIRD YEAR.

The Eclectic reprints from all the foreign Quarterlies, Reviews, Magazines, and Journals their choicest contents, including Essays, Scientific Papers, Biographical Sketches, Reminiscences of Travel and Adventure, Tales, Stories and Poems. The field of selection is very large, and it is believed that the Eclectic presents a Greater Variety and Higher Standard of Literature than any periodical can hope to do that depends exclusively upon home talent.

A knowledge of the current literature of other countries is indispensable to all who would keep pace with the progress of the human mind; and the Eclectic offers the best, and, indeed, the only opportunity for obtaining this knowledge within a reasonable compass, and at a moderate price.

Among the in writers recent numbers of the Eclectic are: The Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, James Anthony Froude, Matthew Arnold, Charles Kingsley, Robert Buchanan, Geo. MacDonald, John Ruskin, Alfred Tennyson, Thomas Hughes, William Black, Mrs. Oliphant, Thos. Hardy, William Morris, Miss Thackeray, Mrs. Alexander, Profs. Huxley and Tyndall, Richard Proctor, R. A., Prof. Owen, Drs. W. B. Carpenter, Max Muller, J. Norman Lockyer, Herbert Spencer, and others equally well known. Besides the regular articles in the body of the magazine, there are four original Editors' departments: Literary Notices, Foreign Literary Notes, Science and Art and Varieties.

With regard to the character of the selections, the aim of the Eclectic is to be instructive without being dull and entertaining without being trivial. While each number contains something of interest to every member of the family circle, it strives itself particularly to that great body of intelligent readers who seek profit as well as amusement in solid and healthful literature.

Besides the 128 pages of reading matter, each number of the magazine contains a Fine Steel Engraving—usually a portrait—executed in the most artistic manner.

TERMS.—Single copies, 45 cents; one copy one year, $5; two copies, $9; five copies, $20. Trial subscriptions for three months, $1.

The Eclectic and any $4 Magazine to one address, $8.
