CATTLE DISEASE ALMOST STARTED CIVIL WAR
A deadly cattle disease almost touched off the Civil War several decades before its recorded beginning.

Texas fever was rampant in cattle herds of the southern states long before the Civil War, and northern stockmen armed themselves to stop southern owners from bringing trail herds across state lines for grazing. This was done because it had been noted that when southern cattle mingled with those in or from the north, the northern animals became infected.

In 1888 and 1889, it was discovered that the disease was being caused by a tiny blood parasite, spread to cattle by ticks, and veterinarians inaugurated a cattle-dipping program that eventually rid herds of this malady.

If Texas fever had not been conquered, it would have been impossible for the South to build the thriving livestock industry it has today.

Newly harvested potatoes have more vitamin C than those that have been stored for a month.
