CAUGHT BY A CLEVER RUSE.

Another bungle! snapped Bristowe, that dry old detective, throwing down his newspaper. If that man had a smattering of science at his fingers' tips he could have done the trick.

It was a bit of science that once helped me to get $2,500, get at the root of as queer a mystery as ever I tackled, and possibly to save a gentleman's life into the bargain.

It was Sir Gavin Grey's case, if you remember—Grey, the great London banker. He had a fine old place down at Wimbledom, that his niece, Kate, used to keep for him.

They say, and I believe that that girl might have married any man she liked, but, of course, it so happened that the lucky fellow who crept into her heart was only a cashier at her uncle's bank—Leo Markhouse by name. The old gentleman gave way, on the condition that they waited till the young fellow proved himself fit for a partnership and for such a wife. Then came a deadly crash.

Would you believe it, this Markhouse was fool enough to go and make use of a check that ought to have gone into the bank, and somehow or other it was found out before he could pay it back. Sir Gavin sent him about his business with an alternative of prosecution. And one evening, a week later, when the old gentleman got back to his Wimbledom house, the first thing he heard was that Markhouse had been there, and that Miss Kate had gone off with him—gone for good.

For some days Sir Gavin was absolutely crushed, and never left the house. He would go and sit in his study for hours at a stretch, with the door locked, hardly moving all the time, they said. Well, there was a glass door in this study, opening on to a sort of balcony, and one night, when he was sitting there so, that door opened, and a man walked in.

Burglar? No; it was Markhouse, come there with his wife to ask for one chance to redeem his backsliding. As luck would have it, he had seen the light in the study and chose that way.

Markhouse pleaded hard and tried to explain things, but the old gentleman was hard as granite. At the finish he dragged open a drawer and threw a packet on the floor.

"There," he says, "you've wasted your time and eloquence. Your wife's mother left at her death $1,000 and some jewelry. There it is, and there the way out; and I never wish to see either of you again."

Markhouse swears that he never once thought of touching the packet, but simply stood still for a time dazed by the prospect of the other man's bitterness. Then he pulled the glass door to, and went down the balcony steps and along the avenue to where Kate was standing in a tremble, staring at that light from the study.

They had got to the end of the avenue when there came after them a hoarse scream, unnerving enough in the circumstances. Just the one word—"Murder!" and nothing more.

Murder? Well, the old gentleman had been struck sideways, it seemed, as he sat. There was a purple mark on his own right temple, and there was his own heavy ebony ruler lying nearby.

And the man? Well, Markhouse suddenly woke up to the fact that they were pointing at him, and that the buzzing had stopped.

"There he is!" says someone. "Don't let him go!"

"Is everyone mad?" he asked. "Kate, what does it mean?"

"Mean?" says Silverley, Sir Gavin's man servant, "why, it means murder, Mr. Markhouse, and you mustn't leave this house yet. You came here for money, stealthily: I was in the hall and I heard every word of your quarrel. When you had gone I knocked several times, but the door was locked. I called the others, and we broke in to find him lying."

Of course he ought to have stood his ground, but the thought that his wife believed him guilty fairly paralyzed him, it seems. At any rate he turned and went off without another word—as bad as thing as he could have done.

It seemed clear enough: Markhouse had struck the blow in a temper and was missing. Two days; then came the news that Markhouse had been arrested easily a few miles away, simply remarking that he cared not a jot whether they brought him in innocent or the reverse.

Miss Kate sent a man galloping off with a telegram. That telegram was addressed to me and it simply said, "Come instantly, upon a matter of life and death."

I took a train for Wimbledon the next morning and found that the inquest was afoot. In the general excitement I had plenty of time to look about, while I mournfully smoothed a crape band round my hat. In fifteen minutes I had heard a good deal.

About 8 o'clock that evening the drawing-room at the Wimbledon house presented rather a dramatic sight. All the household, from Silverley down to the scullery maid, had filed in there at my request, and formed a gaping, excited group.

When, after giving them plenty of time for whispering, I walked in, carrying a black bag, you could have heard a pin fall.

"All here?" I began, very impressively. "Very good." A queer pause.

"Now, I wish to tell you all something. Up till two hours ago, I confess, I could find no possible loophole in the net that at this moment surrounds Leo Markhouse. I have called you all here to tell you that now I fancy there may be one."

Another breathless pause, as I fetched out a square of cardboard.

"All hangs upon this," I said, "a photograph of the deceased gentleman's eyes, taken after death. Two hours back, I made the accidental discovery that there was in those eyes the indelible reflection of a face. By tomorrow morning if there is any basis for the well known scientific theory that the eyes of a person meeting death by foul play often catch and retain a likeness of the assassin's features, we may be in possession of the truth. Is this the face of Mr. Markhouse? I am not at all certain of it. I am going straight away now to have this snap shot of mine enlarged to ... and then—— In the ... time, I ... ask you not to let the matter go beyond the house."

I had motioned to Kate, and she followed me to the hall ... [illegible]

"Well you will ... [illegible] ... You have deceived ... [illegible] ... Show me that ... [illegible] ... I shall scream out!"

... [illegible] ... "This photograph? It is a blank card, son? Miss Mavenne ... [illegible] ... think I ... [illegible] ... you will ... [illegible] ... window in ten minutes ... [illegible] ... First train ... [illegible] ... all the ... door ... [illegible]

Four hours later, when everything was quiet, I heard someone creeping along the passage leading from the servants' quarters and the two flights. A moment, yes, he was standing at the top of the flight as if afraid to go on. I had him! Up I crept. He went straight along to that room and tried the handle. I heard him striking a match. It was Silverley. For very nearly half of the room lying behind those white hangings and it seemed that my bit of bluff was going to have results.

He drew back the hangings and stared hard at the poor old gentleman's eyes. They were closed, of course, and would never open again.

A check behind him did the rest. I was pulling the door open and he sprang across in a frenzy—just too late.

He gave a sort of choking scream and then all was quiet. Down I ran and woke one of the servants. However, when we opened the door there was no need to use force, or even to ask questions. He was on his knees there and gasped out the truth on the spot.

"I—I did it in self-defense. Let me out—only let me out. It was all quiet in there. I ran thru the drawing-room and along the balcony, and he was sitting with his head down, so, and the packet was lying there—anyone's property. I—I thought he was in a fit, and found my hand on the packet before I knew it. He saw me and snatched at my throat, like this, in a passion. He was mad and would have strangled me, and I—I had to do it. I never meant to let Mr. Markhouse in for it till I—I—Oh, heavens! I didn't! What have I said?"

A bit more than I had expected. Enough, at any rate, to get him penal servitude.—London Tid-Bits.

THE LOWELL OBSERVATORY.

Important Discoveries of the Year by the Astronomers at Flagstaff, Arizona.

The astronomers at Percival Lowell's observatory at Flagstaff, Arizona, have been very busy this year. Dr. J. J. See, who is largely responsible for the important discoveries made there, is in Boston with all his records, for the purpose of superintending their publication.

Briefly summarised, the work of the year at Flagstaff includes the discovery of about 500 new stellar systems; measuring of some 700 systems noticed by previous observers, the careful examination of 50,000 stars in the zone between 20 and 65 degrees south declination, all brighter than the tenth magnitude, the detection of the rotations of Jupiter's third and fourth satellites, resulting in valuable information; an exhaustive generalization of the stars in space, an investigation with excellent results of the phenomenon known as the twinkling of the stars, and a generalization of many double stars.

Mr. Lowell took up the study of Mercury and Venus. In the course of a few months he was able to prove that these two planets rotate only once in the course of their sidereal revolutions, and thus show only one hemisphere to the sun. Mercury was found to have numerous perfectly distinct markings and to be practically devoid of atmosphere. Venus has markings which are more difficult, but clearly recognizable in the clear and pure air of Arizona. It was shown to have numerous fine lines upon its surface, and a moderately dense atmosphere.

Besides the planetary work, the subject of double stars was taken up and here Dr. See made his discoveries alluded to above. Some of the new stars are very large and bright, and are certainly among the most important of known stellar systems. In addition to these bright stars there are many others which are very close and can be barely separated in the great telescope when the images are very still. It was even suggested that a few of the most difficult objects, those which are excessively obscure and shine with a dull, brownish light, might not be self-luminous, but are probably planets shining by reflected light. Should these darkish bodies turn out to be actual planets they would be the first of the kind ever seen. They are certainly unique in appearance, and lie on the very limit of vision, and every one of these objects swept upon by Dr. See was found to be new.

Dr. See is occupied with problems of cosmical evolution, and the new material gathered by the Lowell observatory will prove of great value in future research. Mr. Lowell's interest in these matters is said to be quite as great as in the study of planets.

The Anti-Football Crusade.

The most painful result of the anti-football crusade this year has been its effect upon the college presidents. These learned men seem to indorse football with a rarely an exception. President Eliot of Harvard has already been quoted in its favor, while President Dwight does not need to be quoted, since football has always been a great sport at Yale. President Schurman of Cornell has also indorsed the football game. And now we find both President Rogers of the Northwestern university of Chicago and President Harper of the university of Chicago going with President Eliot, Dwight and Schurman. President Rogers announces that football is a good sport, while President Harper, in answer to a request for his views, has said that "life is too short" to think about it. "There are too many other things in this world that engross our attention, so I do not worry about it." And according to Dean Judson of the university, Dr. Harper is an expert on the game. Still, it is to be hoped that the opposition to football will not cease. As we have before remarked, "criticism is needed to stimulate politeness between players, cultivate only the manly virtues and keep down the death rate."—Springfield Republican.
