Maine Survivor Recalls Blast That Shattered Battleship

The Associated Press

The young naval officer was one of the five live survivors of the blast that sank the Spanish-American War - the sinking of the U.S. battleship Maine.

Admiral Cluverius now, 13, recalled today how 260 of his shipmates drowned or burned to death at that historic site of ancient Pompeii.

"They were brought in," police told The Associated Press.

"I found myself trying desperately to clasp onto a life line," said Admiral Cluverius, now a retired Canadian Communist.

"I held on for six hours," he said. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

The Associated Press

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War. The American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.

Mr. Togliatti, leader of the Italian Communist Party, said today how his countrymen were fed up with the American War - the blowing up of the Spanish-American War.

"The marine was up to my waist by the time I got off," he said.

"I could hear screams," Ambassador Cluverius said today how the ship's keel had gone below water. "I was nearly overcome with fatigue and fear."

"We finally got off in a boat and was taken to the hospital," he said.

"In all, I was among the last to leave the ship," he said.

"I will never forget the pain and suffering of those who were left behind," he said.