Seek To Restore Hyde Hall

As An Historic Landmark

The future of Hyde Hall, one of America's great houses, is in doubt as a result of the state's refusal to give it the same aid as it does to a number of other historic landmarks in the state. Hyde Hall, near Cooperstown, is a vast house which was begun in 1810. It is of particular interest to those who are interested in the architectural history of the United States.

Hyde Hall was built for George Hyde Clarke, who was a classmate of Clarke's. Although he was not a professional architect, he was also an Englishman. After the death of his father, he took a great interest in the building and spent a great deal of time on it. The Hall was completed in 1820 and is one of the most beautiful houses in the United States.

The house has been in the hands of the Hyde family ever since its completion. It has been owned by a number of members of the family, and has been used as a summer home for many years. It is a large house, with a number of rooms, and is of a very fine quality.

There is a great deal of interest in the building in the Cooperstown area. Many people have visited the house, and have been impressed by its beauty and its historic importance. There is a great deal of hope that the state will give it the same aid as it does to other historic landmarks.

The state of New York has been reluctant to give aid to Hyde Hall, and has refused to do so. This is partly because of the state's financial problems, and partly because of the attitude of some members of the state legislature. It is hoped that the state will change its attitude and give Hyde Hall the aid that it deserves.
