Everywhere that the armies went, went also the photographers. Here in one picture we see them preparing for work at the Signal Station of the army on the Appomattox near City Point. In another they are leisurely preparing for action on the banks of Bull Run just previous to the second battle. Here was no resemblance to the first battle of Bull Run, where Brady’s initial attempts to secure views of an actual engagement resulted in his fleeing for his life and returning to New York for a new outfit. In the third picture we see Brady talking with General Burnside, while that general was preparing to cross the Rappahannock in December, 1862.
