correspondents to consider the following question and poll their classmates on it: "With the advent of the 'permissive society,' what is the role of marriage?"

Many, the question seemed irrelevant to the "high school" environment. For the majority, marriage was a far-off, distant event, to which they would never give a thought. The problem of marriage was not even considered in the context of their own lives, but was something that would be faced in the future, perhaps after they had established careers and homes. The idea of marriage seemed to be something that existed on another plane of existence.

A period of mutual understanding is necessary for marriage. Psychological research indicates that the roots of unhappy marriage are found in the lack of understanding between the two people. Marriage is an institution that meets the needs for security, companionship and love. It is a commitment to each other, to the future and a way of ensuring both individuals the opportunity to develop to their full potential.

The perplexing question of the future of marriage is an important one to them. For many, the question of marriage was placed before a wide number of Gorton students. To many, the question seemed irrelevant to the "high school" environment. For the majority, marriage was a far-off, distant event, to which they would never give a thought. The problem of marriage was not even considered in the context of their own lives, but was something that would be faced in the future, perhaps after they had established careers and homes. The idea of marriage seemed to be something that existed on another plane of existence.

The question seemed irrelevant to the "high school" environment. For the majority, marriage was a far-off, distant event, to which they would never give a thought. The problem of marriage was not even considered in the context of their own lives, but was something that would be faced in the future, perhaps after they had established careers and homes. The idea of marriage seemed to be something that existed on another plane of existence.

The Herald Statesman asked its school society, 'What is the role of marriage?' In their teens, and all single, the subject was an impertinent one to them. For many, the question seemed irrelevant to the "high school" environment. For the majority, marriage was a far-off, distant event, to which they would never give a thought. The problem of marriage was not even considered in the context of their own lives, but was something that would be faced in the future, perhaps after they had established careers and homes. The idea of marriage seemed to be something that existed on another plane of existence.

The perplexing question of the future of marriage is an important one to them. For many, the question of marriage was placed before a wide number of Gorton students. To many, the question seemed irrelevant to the "high school" environment. For the majority, marriage was a far-off, distant event, to which they would never give a thought. The problem of marriage was not even considered in the context of their own lives, but was something that would be faced in the future, perhaps after they had established careers and homes. The idea of marriage seemed to be something that existed on another plane of existence.